LECTURE [illegible] THE GENUINENESS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY [illegible] LIGHTBODY.

[Concluded.]

9. Is it necessary to add to this list the name of Clemens of Alexandria [illegible]

[illegible]

So far is this, that the language of the New Testament is of ancient date, and those who are competent judges, know that it is just such a language as might be expected from the apostles, from persons of their age and in their situation, and from no others. It is a style neither of classic authors, nor of the ancient christian fathers, but of Hebrews writing in Greek, abounding with Hebraic and Syriac idioms such as would naturally be found in the writings of men who used a language spoken where they lived, but not the common dialect of the country. This peculiarity is a strong proof of the genuineness of these writings; for who could forge them? The christian fathers were for the most part entirely ignorant of Hebrew, and, therefore, were not likely to insert Hebraisms and Syriasms into their writings. The enemies of Christianity would not; therefore, we must conclude that the apostles did write the book [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] with an air of [illegible] Still there was a cloud on his brow—what could be the matter with Mr. A——? To tell the truth, he had that afternoon received in his counting-room the agent of one of the principal religious charities of the day—and had been warmly urged to double his last year's subscription, and the urging had been pressed by statements and arguments to which he did not know well how to reply. "People think," soliloquized he to himself, "that I am made of money, I believe; this is the fourth object for which I have been requested to double my subscription, and this year has been one of heavy family expenses—building and fitting up this house—carpets—curtains—no end to the new things to be bought—I really do not see how I am to give a cent more in charity—then there are the bills for the girls and the boys—they all say they must have twice as much now as before we came into this house—wonder if I did right in building it? And Mr. A—— glanced uneasily up and down the ceiling and around on the costly furniture, and looked into the fire in silence—he was tired, harrassed and drowsy, his head began to swim, and his eyes closed—he was asleep. In his sleep he thought he heard a tap at the door; he opened it, and there stood a plain, poor-looking man, who in a voice singularly low and sweet asked for a few minutes' conversation with him. Mr. A. asked him into the parlor, and drew him a chair near the fire. The stranger looked [illegible] and then turning to Mr. A——, presented him with a paper. [illegible]

[illegible]

"Oh, [illegible] chest [illegible] he spoke these words the figure seemed to vanish, and he awoke with his whole soul stirred within him.

"Oh God and Saviour! what have I been saying? What have I been doing?" he exclaimed. "Take all—take everything—what is all I have to what thou hast done for me?"

MIGHTY MEN IN PRAYER.

Luther excelled other Christians in the tone of his spirit of prayer, as much as he did in actual efficiency. John Knox was second to none in his day, in regard to this quality. The depths of earnestness with which his soul entered into the spirit of prayer, are told in this one petition of his—"Give me Scotland or I die." His heart had seized its object with such an intensity of desire, that its grasp was stronger than death. He plead for a nation's deliverance from the pollutions and prison-house of Popery. The magnitude of the object had absorbed his very being, and thus was he qualified to pour forth that prayer, "Give me Scotland or I die."—And so manifestly was that prayer the secret of his power, that [illegible] were made to confess it. [illegible] Queen of Scots [illegible] rather face [illegible] army [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] for two or three years I was in [illegible] so by [illegible] I knew [illegible] always opened the way for me. [illegible] if I would [illegible] the Holy [illegible]

We know of no good reason why christians should not show their confidence in God by their acts, as well as by their words. All are ready to assent to the truth that [illegible] and that they who [illegible] themselves to serve God, [illegible] in this [illegible] But how many are there that are ready to venture [illegible] promises of God? [illegible] weakness of faith that is in- [illegible] with the christian character.— God's word is pledged to those who yield [illegible] to his service, and who act as [illegible] of what is entrusted to them [illegible] as they [illegible] in God's [illegible] In proportion as they [illegible] will God withhold from them. "The liberal soul deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand."

The friends of Sabbath Schools in this town and vicinity, are requested to meet at the [illegible] Church in this village on [illegible] (Sunday) at [illegible] P. M. to [illegible] the propriety of organizing a [illegible] Sabbath Schools.

[illegible]

[illegible] which [illegible] for a number of years echoed back from their empty walls the [illegible] of the [illegible] and constant attendants on the throne of grace to be found in the sanctuary. It is this kind of instruction, as it flows with unabated zeal from the lips of the minister, that will exert a most salutary influence upon the whole community around, and draw crowds to the house of God. It is this that will form a kind of nucleus around which christians will love to linger. It is this that will serve us as a beacon-light to heaven, if administered with a skillful zeal in accordance with the Bible's teachings.

The scriptures abound with evidence which would go to prove the necessity of instructive preaching. "The priest's lips should keep knowledge," may have a particular bearing on this point, while also it is said in scripture that the Lord would give to pastors according to his own heart, "which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding." Also the ministers who are instructed of God, are desired "to bring forth out of His treasures things new and old," and "feed the church of God, which He has purchased with His own blood." A moment's glance at the epistle to the Romans, will speak volumes in favor of apostolic instruction. So, also, the prayer for the Phillipians abounds in rich allusions to instructive preaching. "And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in judgment." Also, in Collossians, "whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom." And also, in Paul's solemn and impressive charge to Timothy, it is held forth as a prominent truth, that the minister of God should be instructive in his labors for the church and for Christ's kingdom. He commences (2 Tim. iv. 1,) his charge in the most solemn and impressive manner: "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing, and his kingdom; [illegible] in season, [illegible] exhort with all [illegible] and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure [illegible] their own lusts [illegible] themselves teachers, [illegible] and they shall turn [illegible] the truth, and shall [illegible] He also charges [illegible]

Now, Mr. Editor, I [illegible] that it may be laid down as a rule, that in proportion to the amount of instruction imparted by the ministry, the people will sustain the worship of God in the sanctuary by their presence and their influence. Otherwise, the worship of God will present no more than ordinary inducements, (which alone ought to be sufficient) in bringing up the people to a general interest and attendance in this matter. I believe it will hold true, that in many of our societies, where there has been a [illegible] neglect on the part of the people in their attendance on public worship, the great and prominent reason for such a course of conduct may be attributed to the lack of proper instruction from the [illegible] on this very point. The "highways and hedges" have not been searched, [illegible]

[illegible] and after reading a few verses of scripture, and uniting in a brief prayer, leaving the [illegible] mother to watch over her [illegible] we accompanied the bereaved father to the last resting place designated for the mortal part of his little Mary.

At two o'clock P. M. we obeyed the summons which came from another house of mourning. James had ceased to breathe; and duty called us to place his body by the side of that of his younger brother Lewis, and his elder brother, Stephen—the one having been laid there February 2nd, the other January 24th. (On the 9th of July last an infant son of that family became their pioneer in the path to the grave.) Amid our tears, we lifted up our praises to God, that the eldest daughter, and her little sister Caroline, were convalescing, and we prayed that they might be spared to comfort their parents under the bereavement which they had experienced by the departure of all their other children.

We had other demands for thanksgiving: we thanked God that the parents were sustained by his grace—that we trusted that he had sanctified the hearts of their infant children whom he had taken from them—and that while the hand of sickness was upon the others, they expressed themselves willing to commit the departing spirit into the hands of Jesus. God was praised for all that he had done, because he had seen fit to do it.

At half past three P. M., our tears mingled with those of youthful parents, who, in the agony of their torn hearts bent over the cold face of their only child—their beloved Josephine. We read parts of 1 Cor. 15 chapter. A few words of appropriate exhortation were spoken by the pastor who but a few hours previous had seen the form of his first-born laid in its low bed. He [illegible] that he did not know how to sympathise with bereaved parents—but now he had learned the lesson. Prayer [illegible] sanctifying grace [illegible] for the reviving influences of the Holy [illegible] Lord, [illegible] to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." J. E. Br. Bailey:—I observed in the announcement of the death of Stephen Maxson, it was intimated that some further notice of it would appear, and supposed from that fact that some one had intended to furnish that notice. I however subsequently understood that that was not the case, and hasten to supply in as short an account of that venerable brother, as may be consistent with the circumstances.

Br. Stephen Maxson, from the age to which he arrived, will doubtless be associated in the minds of the reader with the early history of our denomination. At what age he became a professor of religion is not exactly known to the writer, but it was in youth he became a member of the Seventh Day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. In the revolutionary struggle of the country, he became a soldier, and has long been known among us as one of that [illegible] which [illegible] their country's [illegible]

[illegible] which he attended, on the Sabbath about ten days previous to his death seemed deeply affected with the idea that probably this was the last time he should meet his brethren—he spoke several times during the meeting, and having occasion to leave before the close, affectionately bade the brethren farewell. The impression made on the minds of the brethren present was that the premonition might truly prove correct. To his friends it is a happy consideration that he has gone to his rest with a full hope of a glorious immortality. J. M.

For the Register.

Br. Bailey—Agreeable to instruction I forward for insertion in the Register, a brief account of my travels and labors since my engagement as a missionary. The multiplicity of business, fatigues of the journey, and the commotion with which I am almost constantly surrounded, prohibits my using that care in my journal that I could wish.— The open room of a log cottage, swarming with its occupants, with its jostling floor, often serves as my closet—my bible upon my knee my writing table. And as I am by necessity compelled to offer what I have for publication, as I pen it from day to day, without critical investigation, I hope the more refined will overlook my errors.

It was on the sixth of January that we took leave of our friends, and agreeable to appointment, entered upon our tour in search of the scattered and destitute of our denomination, situated in the north western portion of our denominational territory.

7th—called at Olean Point. Here, in this flourishing village, are two families, and although lonely situated as to society, yet persevering in the cause of truth, fully resolved to obey God at the risk of all things. From thence we came to Great Valley—called on a brother, who, without interrogation, acknowledged his convictions of the justice of our cause, and of his becoming a member of some S. D. Baptist Church. From that we passed on to Mansfield, where we spent the Sabbath with first day people, the thaw preventing our reaching the Church at Persia.

[illegible]—called at Persia, and spent only one evening with the friends there, as our instructions required us to hasten to some remote portion of the Mission, and visit nearer home on our return route.

12th—In North East, Erie County, Pa., called at Br. Abel Babcock's, who had for a long season lived without any knowledge of the prosperity of his covenant brethren.— He said "our visit was to him as cold water to a thirsty soul," and wished to express his thankfulness to the society for looking after him. He was in the enjoyment of religion —strong upon the bible Sabbath, and shunned not to defend its cause.

14th—dined at Br. E. L. Langworthy's, in Gerard; found the family still established, and seeking a better world than this. At evening, found ourselves in Kingsville, Ashtabula county, Ohio, and received a hearty welcome with the friends there.

15th—being Sabbath, spoke to an audience whose number amounted to six, two of them were first day people. Our friends here are faithful soldiers in the cause of God, and an ornament to the society. Our Br. Julius Todd, is trying to publish salvation in that place—preaches each Sabbath to three [illegible] except on [illegible] occasions, he then preaches in the country around; his example is worthy of imitation.

[illegible] called at Father Bailey's and [illegible] his head is silvered over with the [illegible] winters, yet he was [illegible] and a bold advocate for the [illegible] of the bible. May he live to [illegible]

[illegible] we broke our carriage, costing both time and money to get it repaired again. The charity of many of these people [illegible] but the howling winds playing through the tops of the lofty sycamores, our carriage turned over, greatly endangering our lives, but we were soon enabled to right it up again, and with our gored heads and bruised forms, made our way to an humble cottage, where we dressed our wounds and spent the remainder of the night. Thus we urged our way on, and although we could make but little progress, we felt it our duty to pursue the journey. As to the face of the country, some portions of it are very beautiful, and others low, swampy, and exceedingly gloomy in its aspect.

25—fell in company with a Baptist minister—received an invitation to preach at his appointment—felt much of the presence of the Lord, and addressed a weeping congregation. Our heart yearns over the people here, and although a stranger, sinners came weeping around, imploring us to tarry with them a season. God's people joined them in their request, and we almost gave up to their entreaties, but finally bade them adieu.

27—came to Port Jefferson, Shelby Co. On our arrival, found Br. B. C. Church laboring with his might. He, with his brethren, had just closed a protracted effort which resulted in much good, giving new courage to the saints and an addition of eight to the Church. Twelve have been baptised, many others give evidence of a renewed heart.— This is a day of rejoicing to the friends here. The cloud which has so long enshrouded them, presenting a gloomy aspect, is beginning to give way—hope is springing up and the sun of righteousness is shedding forth his healing rays. Truly they hope for better days. In this wilderness the kingdom of grace is advancing. Bless the Lord.

28th—left for Jackson Township to join Br. Church in one of his appointments, a distance of some ten miles. It would have been interesting to some of our friends to have seen us following our guide through the woodland, winding our way around the hillocks, crossing the log, pole, and rail bridges. Thus, through swamps and brush, we made our way, with our carriage tossing and reeling like a bark upon the wave, our guide often turning to behold us in our tottering situation, until we were obliged to abandon it, and on horseback pursue our journey. We soon however found ourselves in an humble cottage, fitted for the reception of the gathering multitude. The people came in flocks from all parts, and from whence we could not conceive, only as they shot forth from the thickets in every direction, until the house was literally jammed. Anxiety and ambition dwelt in glowing colors on every countenance. These people will cheerfully go, aided by their torches, from two to five miles through the woods to worship God. Surely, "the wilderness shall bud and blossom like the rose." We believe the Lord met with us, and that to bless. The silvery moon came up just in season to lend its borrowed light to aid the returning groups back to their dwellings.— The forests echoed with their songs of praise, as they returned.

29th—this day being Sabbath, the people assembled for divine worship, filling the house to overflowing. As it was the evening before, so it was on the Sabbath—they came flocking from all parts, boiling forth from the forest in every direction. The worship of God was attended with deep solemnity. While christians were made to rejoice, sinners evidently saw the need of a Saviour.

3 o'clock, P. M.—We now approach a scene of deep interest to those present. On our way from meeting, and in the forest, very suddenly the atmosphere was changed from a clear sky to a tremendous gale, and was heightened to a degree surpassing any thing of the kind ever known before in this country. The bellowing thunder aroused our attention, and we soon discovered the electrified clouds arising in quick succession, darkening the western horizon. The roughness of the way forbade our hastening, and as we had just passed a log cottage situated in a small opening, we made our way thither with all possible speed. We had scarcely alighted ere it blew a heavy gale. The [illegible] were now shut in. Casting our eyes [illegible] the [illegible] clouds [illegible] through the ethereal regions, as though the elements had [illegible] all their forces, [illegible]

[illegible] were compelled to [illegible] port. Our pen fails in describing [illegible] —language is inadequate. The [illegible] which had hitherto been at an awful height, so high that we hoped it might pass off the most of its fury above us, began to bow the forest as if it would, while in its awful struggle, seek for a resting place. At this moment the scene was awfully terrific. The forest appeared at once like a mighty army thrown into consternation—lit up by the apparently burning clouds, and for a moment it appeared that the whole atmosphere was in a flame. This was followed by a mighty crash. Much of the timber was literally shivered, the broken fragments filling the air. Our position appeared the more endangered, as the gale was bending its course directly towards us, and each move seemed to redouble its fury. The females began to sink beneath the terror of the scene, beholding the fragments of the deranged forest flying and falling in every direction, but was in a measure calmed by the deliberate expostulations of Br. L. A. Davis, who at this time administered the consolations of religion. But our situation was awful. Our fate on earth must soon be decided, at least for this time. And when all hope failed, either in ourselves or nature—when it appeared that we must inevitably be engulfed in this raging tempest, the winds parted, passing us on the right and left, sweeping the forest before it—and we were preserved. Bless the Lord for this deliverance. Hallelujah! Amen.

31st—preached at the Baptist House in Port Jefferson, and on the evening of the 1st of February in the Methodist Chapel, where they are holding a protracted meeting.

5th—being Sabbath, spent the day in public worship—people are beginning to flock together.

6th—Meeting still continues. Backsliders are returning, sinners repenting, saints are beginning to weep between the porch and the altar; and [illegible] stacles, we surely should [illegible] of the Lord to go on and many souls gathered in. May the Lord cause them to be removed.

Congressional News.

From the Journal of Commerce.

Washington, Tuesday Feb. 15th.

The New Tariff.—Mr. Clay has brought forward, even sooner than was expected, his project for raising an increased and adequate revenue from duties. There is no way in which the plan can be effected, either within or without the terms of the compromise, except by throwing overboard the distribution act, or amending it so as to strike out the proviso that the distribution shall cease whenever the duties exceed 20 per cent. Twenty-six millions can not be raised by duties, without going beyond 20 per cent. Some have estimated that it will require a rate of 39 per cent., and it is supposed that this will be the rate which Mr. Clay will propose.

Wednesday, Feb. 16.

There is, of course, much anxiety here in regard to the fate of Mr. Clay's resolutions. They will soon become the all-absorbing topic of the session. It is said that the proviso in the distribution act, which suspends the act whenever the duties shall exceed twenty per cent., was put in the bill by the Southern anti-tariff members, for the purpose of binding the States to the anti-protective policy.

I hear it said on all sides that Mr. Clay's project of revenue will not prevail in both Houses; but I confess that I see no [illegible] project which can prevail; and, therefore, the alternative is debt, accumulating debt, debt unprovided for. The U. S. bonds and Treasury notes must, unless provision be made for their redemption, sink low in the market—fall, every day lower and lower, till they fall dead.

As to retrenchment, it is a humbug. Every one conversant with the political history of the country knows that it is [illegible] The Jackson administration came into power, professing economy, [illegible] all that.

The people are now to be [illegible] again with this [illegible] while the expenditures [illegible] with the growth of the country [illegible]

[illegible] (... the Chair.)

[illegible] Appropriation [illegible] to take up this bill [illegible] and to allow Mr. [illegible] the whole bill, and [illegible] strike out the enacting clause.

The Chair decided that that motion was not in order, as the Committee had not the power to destroy, but to amend the bill, and to strike out the enacting clause, did in effect destroy the bill.

From this decision Mr. McKeon appealed.

The decision of appeal was discussed by Messrs. Gilmer, Adams, Hopkins, Fillmore, Atherton, [illegible], Proffit, Underwood, R. A. Cooper, and Pope, when the Chair explained, and

The question on the appeal was taken by tellers and resulted: ayes 78, noes 52. So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Committee then rose, and
The House adjourned.

News of the Day.

From the Savannah Republican, Feb. 11.

LATE FROM FLORIDA.

By the arrival of the U. S. steamer Newbern, Capt. McNulty, we have advices from the seat of war of a later date than appeared in our columns yesterday morning.

We learn from a private letter that on the 2d inst., the garrison at Fort Mellon were surprised by the sudden appearance at the gates of two warriors in rich costume, bearing a flag of truce. They were adorned with silver broaches, rich leggings, and the turban of each was surmounted by the long and drooping feathers of the ostrich. There being no interpreter at the Post, none could tell from whence they came, or what was their business. They were placed under guard, and an express immediately started to [illegible] for an interpreter. Much [illegible] concerning the object of their mission. Some suppose them to be [illegible] the band of Halleck Tustenugge, [illegible] by Major Plympton [illegible] a delegation [illegible] but a [illegible] of one of them [illegible] was partly filled with [illegible] and the general appearance of [illegible] indicative rather of the pride of [illegible] than the humiliation of the [illegible].

[illegible] learn that the friendly band of [illegible] which was mounted by order of [illegible], and which absented itself from [illegible], without leave, has been pursued [illegible] Gwinn, of the 8th, came up [illegible] surrounded and disarmed, and returned [illegible] sans ceremonie to Tampa.— [illegible] have not come in, according [illegible], and are considered decidedly [illegible].

Correspondence of the Savannah Republican.

PILATKA, Feb. 4th, 1842.

The steamer Gen. Taylor has just returned from Fort Mellon, to which post she departed yesterday with a detachment of [illegible] command of Lieutenant Mur[illegible] that garrison. The two [illegible] came in under a white flag at [illegible] have confessed that their party [illegible] on the Ahapopga, about 37 [illegible] Fort Mellon. The command at [illegible], with the exception of a guard [illegible] the post, was to march this day, under the guidance of one of the Indians, [illegible] to Wild Cat, ([illegible]) to attack the hostile band.

[illegible] Governor of Virginia.—The [illegible] to elect a Governor of Virginia, [illegible] ballotings, has failed. By the Constitution of the State, Mr. John M. Gregory, a member of the Executive Council of the State, will be the acting Governor of Virginia from the [illegible] of March. He [illegible] the President— [illegible] and his intimate friend.— [illegible]

[illegible] Steamboats.—The De[illegible] [illegible]

The Hudson Chronicle states that [illegible] playing on the bank of the [illegible] river, on Wednesday last, they found some quantity of specie which had been buried, but which the late freshet had disclosed to view. It was in silver, and amounted, it is said, to near $1000.

Decline of Theatricals.—The Tremont Theatre at Boston closed on Friday night. After the performances, as the audience were about retiring, the acting manager, Mr. Andrews, appeared before the curtain, and after craving their indulgence for a few moments, informed them that that would be the last night which the theatre would continue open under its then management. He stated that during the twenty-five weeks which the theatre had been open the present season, the expenses had exceded the receipts something like $10,000, and that influenced by those losses, and despairing of better times, the lessees had come to the conclusion to surrender their lease, which had been accepted by the proprietors of the house.

A Singular Fact.—There is, says the Hartford Eagle, a fact of great interest to the people of Connecticut in connection with the Amistad negroes. The total population of the State, by the late census, is 310,015, of which 54 are represented as slaves. These 54 include 37 Amistad negroes, who have been declared by the U. S. Courts to be freemen. If the apportionment bill, allowing one representative to every 62,000, passes, the correction which ought to be made, counting these 37 not as slaves but as freemen, will entitle the State to an additional Representative.

The State Prison System.—Mr. Wier, of New York, from the committee on State Prisons, has submitted in the Assembly a long and able report upon the numerous petitions in favor of a change of the present State prison system of labor—concluding with recommending the passage of a bill, in accordance with the petitions. The main features of the bill (which is almost identical with that introduced by Mr. W, at the last session,) are—

The total prohibition of all future contracts for the labor of convicts:

Their employment in occupations necessary for their own safe keeping, accomodation, clothing, &c., or in quarrying or mining, or the manufacture of silk—no convict, in a word, to be taught any other occupation than those specified in the act:

The sale of the products of the labor of the convicts to be made at auction, upon due notice, and

Penalties of fine and imprisonment against the agent or inspector who shall violate any provision of the act.

A bill repealing the law forbidding whites and blacks to intermarry, has passed the Senate of Massachusetts by a vote of 24 to 9.

The Legislature of Ohio.—This body has disgraced itself by passing a resolution denouncing John Quincy Adams as meriting the censure of his country and of Congress for his late patriotic and manly defence of the right of petition! What a contemptible set of Representatives have the good people of Ohio!—Observer.

The Last at Last.—The Albany Argus of Tuesday says, "The bills of the State Bank of New York, at Buffalo, are no longer redeemed by their agents in this city." This is the last of the free banks in Buffalo, all the other banks in that city, both Free and Safety Fund, having failed some time ago.

The circulation of the State Bank of Buffalo on the 1st of December last had been reduced to $5600; as security for which it had $9000 Illinois State Sixes, worth at present prices about $1700. Its circulation a year ago was near $60,000.

Expeditious Voyage.—The whale ship Roman, Capt. Alex. Barker, which sailed from this port, 15th of August, 1840, returned here yesterday with a cargo of 3500 barrels of oil, having, during her absence, circumnavigated the globe, via Cape of Good Hope, returning via Cape Horn.—Capt. Barker has been north to the latitude of 57 degrees, and south to latitude 60; and has been in port and making the passage thirteen and a half months of the eighteen months occupied in the voyage—leaving only four and a half months of the eighteen for "catchings."

The New York Eye Infirmary reports that 1162 patients have been under its care during the past year, of whom 920 were cured. Since the foundation of the institution (21 years) 21,642 patients have been treated.

Desperate Affray.—A fatal affray occurred a couple of weeks since at Lewisburg, Ark., between Dr. Menifee and a Mr. Phillips, in which both were killed. Some difference arose about a note in possession of one of them. They accidentally met— [illegible] and fired. Menifee was shot in the groin, and Phillips in the shoulder. [illegible]

&c., but including the engine and [illegible]. The engine started this tremendous [illegible] at the different watering places, without stopping a wheel. Unfortunately [illegible] happened on the return, in consequence of some obstruction on the road, which did considerable damage to the engine.

Dignified Legislation.—The following statement is made by a correspondent of the N. Y. Courier, and is confirmed in other quarters:

"Mr. Arnold of Tennessee, having taken an active part in the debate on the memorial presented by Mr. Adams, and having called Mr. Rayner of North Carolina to order, the gentleman last named went up to him and audibly threatened to 'knock him down.' Soon after, Mr. Dawson of Louisiana, (who, by the way, always goes armed) deliberately took his seat by Mr. Arnold, and after applying to him a number of most violent and abusive epithets, told him, that if he rose from his seat 'he would cut his throat,' at the same time significantly pointing to the bowie knife he carried in his bosom!"

Baptism of the Prince of Wales—more correctly Rantism.—We cut the following from a New York paper:

Great preparations are making for the baptism of the Prince of Wales, and the ceremony is to be performed under circumstances of great splendor and imposing character. St George's Chapel, at Windsor castle, is being fitted up for the august affair, and the King of Prussia, the Duke of Saxe Cobourg and the Duke of Cambridge, are to be sponsors to the infant Prince. It has been attempted to be shown that the Duke of Sussex, her Majesty's favorite uncle, not being named as sponsor, tends to exhibit, in a powerful point of view, the great influence which the tory administration have lately acquired over her Majesty, thus insinuating that his Royal Highness of Sussex has been objected to politically, for merely being a Liberal. Much has been said by both parties; the Conservatives pointing to the circumstance as a proof of her Majesty's "returning sense"—of her change of mind—and predilection for the party now in power; and the Whigs maintaining that it is a sample of the mode in which the Queen is coerced by her present advisers, and how even her private feelings are opposed and outraged. Now I can tell you as a fact that her majesty has not changed her mind; that her own opinions are still as liberal as ever, and that she has specially called Sir Robert Peel's attention to the distress that exists in the country, and to the necessity of, if possible, providing a remedy for the same. The reason why the Duke of Cambridge has been selected is, because his royal brother "stood" for the Princess Royal, and therefore they now have, or will have, each a similar honor and responsibility. The "youngster" is well and thriving, and the young lady whose "nose has been put out," is equally healthy and promising. J. W. C.

Violent and Destructive Tornado.—We learn from the Cleveland Herald of the 8th inst., that the neighborhood of that city and surrounding country were visited by a most violent tornado, which destroyed a great deal of property. A portion of the towns of Mayfield and Kirtland were laid in ruins, barns and houses unroofed and blown down, fences carried away, and a great deal of injury done to trees, grain, cattle, &c.

One man was killed and several persons had limbs broken. The storm is represented as having been perfectly terrific, and accompanied by thunder and vivid flashes of lightning. Nothing withstood its violence. Trees were instantly twisted off and hurled in the air, heavy stones moved from their places, and log houses torn to pieces and scattered. The width of the tornado varied from fifty to one hundred rods.

Afflicting Disappointment.—We mentioned recently the sad casuality that a woman with her infant child fell from Craigie's bridge, and that both were drowned. Last week her husband, Mr. Lavender, recently arrived at New York, as mate of a vessel, returned to Boston in the full expectation of finding his little family all well. All that now remains to him of his once happy home, is an interesting daughter about six years of age.—Boston Paper.

Temperance in High Places.—Extract of a letter from Washington, dated Feb. 5th, 1842, to E. C. Delavan:

"At the great and splendid levee given on the occasion of his daughter's marriage, the President of the United States of America had not a drop of wine or other alcoholic drinks furnished. Nothing but cold water was to be had—and on a wedding occasion too! What a noble step—one which will draw to him thousands of hearts, warm and fresh, and will tell on the future destinies of this nation.

MR. TALMADGE'S EXCHEQUER PLAN.

On Monday the Hon. Mr. Talmadge submitted, with an elaborate Report, the following Plan for a National Exchequer:

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Tallmadge, from the Select Committee on the currency, made [illegible]

[illegible]

United States, [illegible] to be composed of three commissioners, to be appointed by the President, [illegible] the advice and consent of the Senate, [illegible] to be removed from office only with the like concurrence of the Senate, and for physical inability, incompetency, neglect or violation of duty. The President to communicate to the Senate [illegible] reasons of the proposed removal. For like cause, the President may suspend a commissioner and appoint a temporary substitute, and within the first week of the ensuing session of the Senate, lay before that body the reasons of such suspension; and if the Senate concur, the commissioner to be removed, if not, to be restored.

II. The Board of Exchequer to establish agencies as it may deem necessary and expedient for the public service, limiting the number to as few as the exigencies of the service will admit, in no case to exceed two in any State or Territory.

III. The Secretary of the Treasury to appoint the inferior officers of the agencies, on the recommendation of the Board, and to remove them for physical inability, incompetency, neglect or violation of duty, on like recommendation.

IV. The exchequer and its officers to be the general agents of the Government for receiving, safe keeping, and disbursing the public money from all sources received, to be paid into the Exchequer and its agencies.

V. The Exchequer and its agencies to receive on deposite gold and silver coin or bullion, and to issue specie notes for the same, to be redeemed at the agency where issued; said notes to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, signed by the Treasurer, and countersigned by the President of the Board of Exchequer, and made payable to the order of the principal agent, and endorsed by him when issued of such agency.

VI. The Exchequer and agencies, on the deposite of gold and silver coin, or bullion, to draw and accept bills of exchange, and to receive a premium not exceeding two per cent. Also, to collect drafts or bills, but to make no advance or payment till advised of the collection, and to charge a reasonable commission for collection and exchange.

VII. All specie notes issued, either in payment of the public creditor, or on the deposites of individuals, never to exceed the actual amount of specie on hand for their redemption, dollar for dollar.

VIII. Dues to the United States to be paid in gold and silver coin, in specie notes, or in the notes of banks immediately convertible into specie at the place where received. The exchequer and agencies to settle weekly, or oftener, balances with the banks.

IX. The Exchequer and agencies to keep separate and distinct sets of books; to enter and record in one set all transactions respecting the collection, keeping, and disbursing of the public revenue, and transmitting the public moneys from place to place, for the service of the Government; and in another, all transactions and accounts arising from the operations in exchange, and other transactions not on Government account.

X. The Exchequer may appoint as agent any specie paying bank; but such bank is not authorized to receive private deposites, or to accept or sell bills or drafts on account of Exchequer.

XI. The Exchequer and agencies to act as commissioners of Loans and pension Agents and generally to render all facilities in transferring and disbursing the public funds. Full and exact accounts of the Board and agencies to be furnished to the Secretary of Treasury, and he to report to Congress; necessary rooms and vaults to be provided; sureties to be taken, and penalties prescribed; and strict examinations made.

The bill was then read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. Tallmadge, made the special order of the day for this day two weeks.

Mr. Walker explained that he could not concur in the report. He objected particularly to the use of State Banks as the depositors of the public money, and to the reception by the Government of Bank paper.

Mr. Young, another member of the committee, expressed his dissent from the bill and report.

Three thousand extra copies of the report and bill were ordered to be printed.

The Cincinnati Chronicle says that Mr. Porter has returned to that city from a tour through Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, during which he has received about ten thousand signatures to the Washington pledge.

It will be our object to make the "Register" interesting and profitable to all classes of its patrons. We assure those of all denominations who patronize us, that we intend to furnish them with an evangelical paper, which, while it is the organ of a particular branch of the church of God, will "contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." Its columns will be open for a fair discussion of the doctrines advocated by it. In all our labors we hope to be guided by the spirit of the Gospel, and if we can be successful in promoting practical religion, and induce men to love God, our highest wishes will be gratified.

We are grateful for the approbation and support of our readers, and hope to receive their continued support. All who will aid us in procuring subscribers, and making remittances, shall be duly rewarded.

A portion of our columns will be devoted to Literature, Science, Agriculture, and General Intelligence.

DIED,

At Unadilla Forks, N. Y., on the 18th inst., of Pulmonary Consumption, Mr. BENJAMIN BARBER STILLMAN, aged 22 years.

Mr. Stillman was highly esteemed by his acquaintances as a young man of a pleasant disposition, and promising talents. When about 16 years of age, he gave evidence of experimental piety when he united with the first S. D. B. Church of Brookfield N. Y., of which he remained a member until his death.

In his last sickness he suffered much, and bore his affliction with becoming fortitude, and patience.—The closing scene of his life, remarkably illustrated the faithfulness of God. He was filled with joy at the near approach of death. When he could no longer speak audibly, his last faint whispers were "glory to God! Hallelujah! come Lord Jesus!"

His afflicted parents and relations have much to console them under their loss, and the church has great reason to be humbled under this bereavement.

☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION.

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S. Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

, To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES'

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

CAPITAL,

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!

Incorporated by the State of New York, March 21, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.

CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840, COMBINING

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE

SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC [illegible] time allowed under the [illegible] charter of this company [illegible] 5th day of May next; [illegible] books will continue open [illegible] capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time, or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon, exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, of current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

The Temperance Pledge.

Written by some of the Warsaw Tee-totalers.

Sisters, tell us of the night,
What the signs of earth presage;
Brothers, beaming in its might,
Shines the glorious Temp'rance pledge.
Sisters, does its glorious ray
Drunkards' woes and grief dispel?
Brothers, yes, we hear them say—
"Temperance Pledge, I love thee well."

Sisters, does its heavenly light
Gild the drunkard's glad return?
Brothers, yes, behold the sight!
Drunkards' wives have ceased to mourn!
Sisters, does its glad'ning ray
Childhoods' orphan tears assuage?
Brothers, yes, they're wiped away
By the glorious Temp'rance Pledge.

Brothers, Fathers, will you join,—
Sire and son of ev'ry age?
Sisters, Mothers, we will sign
With you, the Tee-total Pledge.
Joy through earth and Heaven proclaim!
Let the theme our hearts engage!
Earth is saved and man redeemed
By the glorious Temp'rance Pledge!

POPULARITY—A DIALOGUE.

Scene.—A Lawyer's Office.

Enter Presbyterian.

Lawyer.—Good morning, Mr. P.—take a seat sir. I attended your meeting yesterday. I was highly gratified with your new preacher. I admire the warm and powerful style your clergymen are of late adopting. It is certainly calculated to awaken the thoughtless. If you settle Mr. S. in your society, you may consider me as a subscriber. It is true I am not attached to any order of Christians, but I believe the great bulwark of our national liberties must be the diffusion of knowledge; and I have always observed that your people are patronizing and sustaining our seminaries and institutions of learning. By the bye, this reminds me that our election is at hand—I hope, Mr. P. we have the pleasure of numbering you with our friends in the approaching contest.

Presbyterian.—I will think of it. (Exit.)

Enter Baptist.

Lawyer.—Good morning, Mr. B., I am glad you called. Well I went down to the river, yesterday noon, to witness the immersion, and I must say that it is a beautiful ordinance; and it seems to me that mode of administering is the most simple and primitive. To see a little group stand upon the banks of a flowing stream, unite their voices, in that beautiful hymn, "O how happy are they," while the candidate goes down into the water brings forcibly to one's mind the scenes of Jordan and Judea. Besides your clergyman, Elder M. is a very interesting man. Your church government I have always admired—it is so republican. It was Elder L. of your order, I believe, who carried the great Cheshire cheese to Jefferson. He has been a faithful old patriot. Ah, this puts me in mind that the Jeffersonian principles are again to be contested this fall, and I hope I shall find you Mr. B. as firm a patriot as Elder L. has been. (Exit.)

Enter Episcopalian.

Lawyer.—Your most obedient servant Mr. E., happy to see you, sir. Well, I was in New York last week, and I walked four miles in the morning to hear Bishop H. He is a truly polished and eloquent man; and there is something in your mode of worship so systematic and so much in accordance with decency and order, and so much the opposite to that wild ranting kind of worship, that I have fallen in love with it. You see here I have purchased me a common prayer book. The organ and the choir of Bishop H's church, are superior to any I ever heard. I called on the Bishop the next morning, and obtained an introduction to him. He does not, of course, take any open part in politics, yet he gave me to understand, in the course of our conversation, that his feelings were on the right side. (Exit.)

Enter Methodist.

Lawyer.—How do you do brother M., I call you brother, because my parents were methodists. And when I was a child the preachers used to visit our house, and I used to call them all "brothers," from hearing my father call them so. It is singular how strong the impressions of children are. Though I do not profess religion, yet I always feel more at home in a Methodist meeting than any other. And yet I do not know whether this arises so much from the force of my early impressions, as from that simplicity peculiar to your worship, and which is so congenial to my taste. I was riding through G. the other day, and as I came opposite a piece of wood, I heard the sound of singing. I immediately discovered there was a campmeeting in the vicinity, and notwithstanding my business was very urgent I could not resist my inclination. So I tied my beast to the [illegible]

I attended your meeting in the school house the other evening, and was well satisfied with the sermon. Your preachers, whether right or wrong, are certainly men of talent.

Mr. S. used most splendid imagery in his sermon, and his arguments, admitting the premises, were certainly irresistible. I should have been pleased to have invited him home with me, but my wife was rather out of health that evening. I cannot see for my part, why people should be so prejudiced against your sentiments. They are certainly misrepresented. There is one thing people say about your doctrine, which is true; and that is, that "it is extremely captivating;" and as for its influence, I can say that many of our best citizens are Universalists. Let me see, I believe, Squire, that you have always been a warm politician and on the right side.—Well the approaching contest requires our unanimous exertions. (Exit.)

Enter Quaker.

Lawyer.—Well, Thomas, how is thy health? I am glad that thee has taken the trouble to call.

Quaker.—I do not trouble men of thy profession very often; but I have called this afternoon to pay some money to thee. As we do not believe in training men in the art of killing men systematically, they oblige us to pay for the enjoyment of our principles; and I understand thee is—I forgot what military people call it—the man who receives the constitution money.

Lawyer.—Yes, I wish I could get off as well as you do; whereas it costs me ten times the sum, besides eight or ten days drilling every year. But what renders the task more unpleasant is the reflection that always arises when I see the banner flying, and hear the drums beating around me that the object of all this preparation is to train us in the art of destroying each other. And then I always think of the peaceful settlement of Pennsylvania by Penn.—My grandfather was a Quaker, and I have always admired their plainness of dress, simplicity of language and pacific sentiments. In short, Thomas, I have often thought that if we were all Quakers, society would resemble the state of our first parents in Eden.

Quaker.—We shall never be all Quakers, so long as hypocrites have so much influence. If thy grandfather was a Quaker, I am sorry thee has so degenerated from thy ancestors. The scruples thee professes about military duty, condemn thee; for thee must be deluded by the devil to violate thy conscience at so great an expense. Thee speaks our language flippantly, and admires our dress—thy ordinary dialect, and thy fashionable blue coat, figured vest, and gaudy watch embellishments, are incontestible proofs of thy sincerity. Thee eulogizes Penn—I have heard thee eulogize Napolean as highly. I have observed the duplicity thee uses for popularity. Thee reads a sermon for the Presbyterians in the morning when they have no preaching. Thee goes in the afternoon and leads singing for the Churchmen. In the evening the goes to the Universalist meeting. Thee admires the immersion of the Baptist, the camp-meeting of the Methodist and the plain dress and language of the Friend. I will tell thee friend, thee strongly reminds me of my brown horse. I once employed an honest Irishman to labor for me. I sent Patrick out in the morning to catch my brown horse. Now the brown horse ran in the pasture, in the middle of which was a large square pond. Patrick was gone a long time, and at length returned with the beast, after having chased him several times round the pond. "Well, Patrick," said I, "on which side of the pond did you find the horse." "Truth," said Patrick, "and I found him on all sides."

A SCENE IN CONGRESS.

A writer in the N. Y. American gives the following interesting description of the appearance, and manner, and language of John Quincy Adams, when at the close of Mr. Marshall's speech in favor of the resolutions censuring Mr. Adams, he arose to reply.

"When he [Mr. Marshall] concluded, and the Speaker announced to Mr. Adams that his position entitled him to the floor, I thought of a parallel scene,—"Then Agrippa said unto Paul, It is permitted unto thee to speak for thyself. And Paul stretched forth his hand and said." ——

Up rose then, that little, feeble, bald, gray, tottering old man, his eyes dimmed and his hands trembling with constitutional infirmity and age—upon whose consecrated head the vials of tyrannic wrath had now been outpoured, while around him gleamed a hundred lowering brows, in long standing, hereditary hate, kindled into new fury by the arousing of the vilest, most brutal and sordid passions. Among the crowds of slavers who filled the galleries, he could seek no friends, and but a few among those around him, over all of whom, in years gone by, he had held almost imperial sway. The vision of that hour, that moment, I felt was worth more to me than all the rest of my life. No romantic or dramatic scene of fictitious interest ever awakened by the powers of poetic fancy, the high emotions of this solemn, throbbing reality.

Mild, calm, unexcited, undepressed, he turned his meek face on a scene, appalling to many a heart that had a stouter covering, and raised his voice, high-keyed as usual, but clear, [illegible] and firm. [illegible]

all his mock judicial array into air and smoke. 'His grey sand!' O, it was exquisite! Poor Marshall [illegible] his back, flat in the mud, and will never rise again. But the grandest touch of the whole was where Adams, in a tone of insulted majesty and reinvigorated spirit, said in reply to the audacious and atrocious charge of 'high treason'—"I call for the reading of the first paragraph of the Declaration of Independence! Read it! Read it! And see what that says of the right of a people to reform, to change, to dissolve their government."

The look, the tone, the attitude and gesture of the venerable insulted patriot at that instant, were most imposing. The voice was that of sovereign command as of a Cæzar to his legions. His slight stooping frame seemed to dilate and heighten; the burden of seventy-five years had rolled off from him; and shone out above the slight things around him, (who had thought themselves his equals in being his associates,) like an annointed king, or an inspired prophet.

When the reader came to that passage of the Declaration that solemnly proclaims the right of Reform, Revolution, and Resistance to oppression, the old man thundered out, "Read that again!"—And he looked proudly around on the listening audience, as he heard his triumphant vindication sounded forth in the glorious sentences of our Revolutionary Magna Charta. The sympathetic instantaneous revulsion of feel was tremendous and palpable, though voiceless.—Every drop of free, honest blood in that vast assemblage, bounded with the high impulse, and every fibre thrilled with the excitement. The whole action, though simple, natural, and unaffected, was dramatic and effective beyond Shakespeare's noblest conception.—John Kemble might have learned in this school of nature's action.

A strong exhibition of the facts in the case, mostly in cold, calm, logical, measured sentences, concluded Mr. Adams' high toned appeal from the profane babblers of this slavish generation, to the sainted fathers of that system of Revolutionary liberty of which he is the coeval and the noblest champion and representative. And then he sat down, vindicated, victorious."

The Mystery of Mesmerism and Somnambulism Explained.—Animal magnetism has for some years amused and bewildered the lovers of the marvellous. Ridiculed as a mere illusion or delusion, it has nevertheless perplexed the scientific; its effects are too palpable to be denied, but any rational solution of the cause or causes in which they have originated has hitherto eluded detection.—The honor of unveiling this mystery was reserved for Mr. James Braid, an eminent surgeon in Manchester, who having witnessed the recent experiments of Monsieur Lafontaine, in the Athenæum of that town, determined, if possible, to bring the system to the test of physiological and anatomical principles. This gentleman, having satisfied his own mind that he could produce the phenomena without personal contact, and even induce sleep when in a different room from the person to be thrown into a state of somnolency, announced a public lecture on the subject, which he delivered at the Manchester Athenæum, on Saturday last before seven hundred persons.

Mr. Braid first placed on a table a common black wine bottle, in the mouth of which was a cork having a plated top. The individual on whom the experiment was to be performed, was seated in a chair and directed to gaze intently at the cork without winking or adverting the eyes. The cork was about two feet from the person operated upon, whose head was inclined backwards, forming with the object an angle of forty-five degrees. In this position he remained for about five minutes, when profound sleep was produced.

The second experiment was completed in the same time. In the third, a bandage was placed round the head, for the purpose of retaining in an immoveable position, a common bottle cork, a little above the roof of the nose, as the object to be gazed at, and in about four minutes a complete state of somnolency ensued. In this case was proved the inability of the patient to open the eye-lids, although consciousness was in no respect suspended, as he was able to reply distinctly to any question. The fourth experiment failed, either through the noise that prevailed, or owing to the person not fixing his gaze continuously on the object.

The fifth was successful, and although the party made a desperate effort to open his eyes, so much as to agitate his whole frame, they remained as though hermetically sealed; when Mr. Braid took from his pocket a wooden ruler, and drew the end of it gently over the upper eye-lids of both eyes, when the spell was broken, and the sense of sight restored with perfect ease. These experiments fully demonstrated that the phenomena was perfectly independent of animal magnetism, as in no instance was there the least approach to personal contact or any manipulation.

Having thus convinced the audience that sleep could be produced without pressure of the thumbs or waving of the hands, as employed by Monsieur Lafontaine, M. Braid proceeded to explain the rationale of his discovery.

The artificial mode of producing sleep is to fatigue the rectus and levator muscle of the eye, which is effected by a continuously strained and intent gaze at an object viewed under an acute angle. Under such circumstances, the irritability of these muscles becomes exhausted, as well as the irritability of the optic nerve; giddiness causes a mist to rise up before the eyes and sleep ensues. Congestion is induced in the eyes and carried from them to the [illegible] of the eye, [illegible] proximity to the origin of the [illegible] respiration and circulation [illegible] through sympathy [illegible] ed in the region of the heart, and it is thus stimulated; and in order to remove the inordinate load, it is compelled to increase the frequency of its contractions, in order to compensate for the feebleness of its efforts. The brain, head and face now become conjested in consequence, and varied phenomena, resulting from irregularity in the circulation of that important organ, the brain, follow. The inability to raise the upper eyelid Mr. Braid accounts for on the principal of temporary paralysis of the leviator muscles, owing to excessive and long-continued exertion at the commencement of the operation.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER

From a Young Lady in —— S. C. to her friends in —— Connecticut.

"I commenced teaching in Mrs. W.'s family in a week after my arrival; and continue here still; but such are the cruelties practised by her that I am resolved not to remain with her. She is a northern lady with southern principles and habits. While on the passage and after her arrival home, she appeared to be a very amiable woman. For some time my presence served as a check, but of late, her cruelty I think would destroy the health and happiness of any but those whose hearts are made of steel. Charlotte, Mrs. W.'s waiter, is whiter than I am.—Seated at the table I cast my eye upon her; she stood submissive, lame and almost blind, one eye so swollen that she has not opened it for three days, perfectly black, with matter continually running down her face. This was done with a blow from a stick of wood. I was so wrought upon that I rose without tasting a morsel, and escaped to my room to weep for the sufferer. This gave offence. Charlotte is beaten every day more or less. She was beaten three times in one hour; first with the broom handle over the head and face; second, with the table sticks—it seemed as if every blow would take life—third with the dust brush. She is beaten with a raw hide upon the bare flesh, but Mrs. W. says that does not hurt her any.

The cook works night and day with little intermission. The tongs have been used for her correction. She has a little babe, not a year old, which has already begun to feel the blows of the tyrant mistress. O! what agony fills the mother's heart. O! could the advocates of slavery see what I have seen, and hear what I have heard, they would pity the slave. The horrors of slavery can never be told; ink will refuse to commit to paper cruelties as I have seen.

"I am afraid that the Abolitionists of Middlesex are relaxing their efforts. O, tell them to labor and pray, spend and be spent for the slave; for it is a noble cause. O what mockery to send Missionaries and Bibles to the heathen, whilst three millions of our own countrymen are in heathenish darkness, and suffering more than heathenish cruelties. Whilst women are groaning as I have heard them groan, when they thought no ear but that of God could hear,—'O God have mercy—O may my life be short,' will women at the north look on and be indifferent?

"Maria says she once repented of all her sins and was about to commit the fatal deed, when she thought one sin could not be repented of. This was all that saved her.

"I will not attempt to write any more, pen and paper cannot convey an idea of what I will tell you when a kind Providence permits me to see your loved faces again."

The Writers of Books.—Goodhue in his Library Manuel, estimates that of about one thousand books published annually in Great Britain, six hundred are accompanied with commercial loss, on two hundred there is no gain, on one hundred the gain is trifling, and only on one hundred any considerable profit. He sets it down as certain that of the whole thousand, six hundred and fifty are forgotten within the year, another hundred and fifty within three years, and scarcely ten are thought of after twenty years.

Of the 50,000 books published in the seventeenth century, not more than 50 are now in estimation, and of the 80,000 books published in the eighteenth century not more than 500 are sought after at the present time. Since the first commencement of writing—that is in thirty-two centuries—only about 500 works of writers of all nations have sustained themselves against the devouring influence of time.

HAIR! HAIR!

BALDNESS.—Important Discovery—the Great Mystery found out at last.

DR. STERRY'S HAIR REGENERATOR.—Dr. Sterry, after much attention to the important subject of preserving the hair, has after many experiments chemical and physical, been able to discover an article which is now offered with the greatest confidence for the toilet, as the best thing ever discovered, its softening and penetrating quality, to produce a good head of hair—to prevent it from falling off when baldness is apprehended—to restore it when baldness has taken place, and to prevent it from turning gray. It is more nourishing than pomatum, antique oil, or Cologne water. It is a beautiful article for ladies' curls—it makes the hair soft and lively, and produces uncommon brilliancy. Thousands have tested its superior virtues and excellence, and in every instance it stands unrivalled. It is an infallible cure in all affections of the skin on the head—as dandruff, &c. &c. Every family should be supplied with a bottle of this oil, that by its application to the head and hair of children, the beautiful and ornamental appendage of a fine head of hair, which nature has supplied us may be preserved.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and use administered to more than 18 000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

N. B. Ask for Dr. M. Hitchcock's Worm Tea, as there are many nostrums abroad for the destruction of worms.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC,

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

Musings—No. 8.

"What is life but a dream," said I, and Echo answered—"but a dream."

Who that has looked with a thoughtful eye upon the ever changing, yet ever beautiful volume of nature—who that has watched the seed as it bursts its envelope, sending the tiny root into the bosom of the dark brown earth, and its graceful stem to seek the air and bright sunshine, and has then watched the gradual developement of bud, flower, and fruit, and has found himself incapable of reviving one faded blossom, or restoring the withered bud, has not asked in the spirit of true enquiry—what is life? Who will unfold the secret of that invisible agent that pervades the universe, and yet escapes the ken of the most discerning? As he turns from the frail, but lovely flower, to the beautiful insect fluttering around it, or to the yet smaller one that has found a sweet home amid its branches, his wonder, aye, and admiration, too, are again excited. He has turned over another leaf in the great volume his Father has given him, and he finds it replete with beauty and instruction. How varied, how wonderful the changes of those insects. Yet their every change has been a step towards perfection; they have been rising higher and yet higher in the scale of being, till their expanded powers have opened to them a wider world—have enabled them to rise heavenward; and now with the ends of their existence answered, they are prepared to die. The observer looks again, and whether his eye rests upon the minute insect of a day, or upon that noble creature who's century comprising life exhibits so strange a mingling of the unerring instinct of the brute, and the reason of man; or upon any one of the links connecting these extremes, he equally finds himself in a world of wonder. His eye at length reaches the highest, brightest, link in the chain of existence that mortals can perceive. If he has recognized the hand of God in the verdant moss, defying the "storm king" in his power, or the shell fish in its rock-bound home and ocean's depths he sees in that being made in the image of his God, the masterpiece of creation—a work worthy a God. Yet that link, bright as it is, becomes dim. High as it is in the scale of being, the manly form falls to earth and enriches the soil whence it derived its support. The "soul lit eye" closes upon the beauties of its earthly home. The voice once eloquent becomes silent. The features assume the color and fixedness of marble. As the lamp of life burns low in its socket, as its last flickering flame is lost mid the darkness that envelopes the great destroyer, the question again arises, what is life? Should the heart-prompted question awaken old echo, and her response should be—but a dream—touching no responsive chord in the feeling heart, who would not bid the aerial messenger carry back so unwelcome an answer, and immure it in echo's rocky home. Again on the wings of the wind is borne the sound of many voices, each laden with the enquiry—what is life? Echo is silent, but the literature of the day has caught her answer and replies —but a dream.

The conclusion is then forced upon the enquiring mind, that false sentiment claims a home among us—that it speaks through the press and in language oft-times beautiful, seduces the thoughtless almost into the belief that life is indeed like a flower that decks the landscape for a few hours, and is then no more—like a cloud that sports for a while with the winds of heaven, and disappears; that it is like the morning dew—like a dream.

Do such sentiments, oft repeated as they are, fall upon the mind as does the breath upon the mirror's polished surface, leaving no trace behind? Let us examine for a moment and see if echo answered truly—see if the life of a

"Sky born, sky guided, sky returning race"

is, indeed, dream-like. Look at that lovely "child, the rose leaf of a day." Beauty has left its impression on every feature. The eye gloriously speaks of the mysterious indwelling spirit. It soon learns to lisp the name parents so love to hear. In a thousand winning ways it has, almost imperceptibly, thrown its tendrils around the parents' heart. So closely has its very life-strings [illegible]

[illegible]

He bound them in his sheaves.'"

Has that lovely child left no trace behind? Though a few summers only have scattered their flowers in its pathway, though its name was scarcely known beyond the circle of home friends, it has not lived in vain. Its influence is traced in imperishable characters upon the hearts of its devoted parents. It has unsealed fountains sweet to the taste and doubly sweet to memory. It has called into exercise feelings that might otherwise have slumbered on unconscious of their existence. Again and again has it suggested thoughts of duty and responsibility till then unknown; and now that it has gone to its Father and its God, will it not lead their mind heavenward? The life of the infant, then, if a dream, is one full of reality—a waking dream that encircles others in its influence.

But does the Reaper pass the opening bud—leaving its fair petals to unfold and its fruit to ripen ere he gathers it? The child soon claims a place in the school room—the play ground—and the circle where children love to congregate. Wherever he may go, his influence, slight though it be, accompanies him, and all unconsciously to himself he is imparting and receiving an impress that after years may not efface. But the meridian of life soon succeeds its dawn. The circle in which he moves becomes wider and yet wider, till mountains and oceans, nature's own barriers, are o'erleaped. Whatever may be his station, whether public or private, his influence is a part of himself from which he cannot escape,—for which he is responsible—"With what a skilful hand should those chords be touched that must vibrate to all eternity." Life truly then, if a dream, is a dream of full, of fearful import. Was Voltaire dreaming while penning those publications that have warped a mass of mind into disbelief of the truth—that pictured our holy religion as a senseless mockery and the Bible a collection of cunningly devised fables? Was Napoleon dreaming when to gratify his insatiable ambition he trampled upon the rights of others and waded through the blood of slaughtered millions to a throne? Were the heroes of '76—were Howard and Wilberforce dreamers? Life, with them, methinks, was not "the stuff that dreams are made of." Though reason may slumber, and with it the consciousness of responsibility, and life seem indeed dream-like, it is nevertheless real; its every act is recorded, and when that record meets us we shall know and feel that "it is life that seals our credentials for the bliss or wo of eternity"—that even "death hath no sting but what [illegible]"

Is the domestic circle the centre of your influence? Responsibilities, high and holy, cluster thick around it. Though woman's province be home—though every public place be effectually closed against her, her influence may and ought to be felt in all. Who are the occupants of the high places in our loved Republic, but the husbands and fathers, sons and brothers of the ladies of our land? Let home, then, woman's appropriate sphere, be the nursery of those virtues we admire and love. Let her hand gently draw the wayward son from his wanderings. Let home be the theatre where the passions are subdued and directed to their appropriate objects—where the kindly, the better feelings of our nature, are carefully cherished—where the principles of our holy religion take deep root in the infant mind, and woman is exerting an influence as wide spread and lasting as it is salutary. Turn to Agrippina, the mother of Nero, and Martha, the the mother of Washington, and read in imperishable characters, a chapter upon woman's influence. No, life is not in any of its phases dream-like. Like the morning dew it may be silent and unobtrusive, but like that it leaves not the earth as it found it. Is it like a flower? Strange indeed must be that flower that is a fitting type of human life—a flower whose essential properties spring from its culture. These properties cannot be neutral—see that they are not deleterious in their influence; but let healing virtue be extracted from the root—beauty and fragrance characterize the flower, and utility be enstamped upon the whole. Is life like a cloud? Let it not be that dark and fearful one upon which the "storm king" rides in his fury—the winds of the [illegible]

Selected for the Register.

There is no moral object so beautiful to me as a conscientious young man! I watch him as I do a star in the heavens: clouds may be before him, but we know that his light is behind them, and will beam again; the blaze of others' prosperity may outshine him, but we know that, though unseen, he illumines his true sphere. He resists temptation not without a struggle, for that is not virtue, but he does resist and conquer; he bears the sarcasm of the profligate, and it stings him, for that is the trial of virtue, but he heals the wound with his own pure touch; he heeds not the watchword of fashion if it leads to sin; the atheist, who says not only in his heart, but with his lips, "There is no God," controls him not, for he sees the hand of a creating God, and reverences it, of a preserving God, and rejoices in it. Woman is sheltered by fond arms and guided by loving counsel; old age is protected by its experience and manhood by its strength; but the young man stands amid the temptations of the world like a self-balanced tower.—Happy he who seeks and gains the prop and shelter of Christianity. Onward then, conscientious youth! raise thy standard and nerve thyself for goodness. If God has given thee intellectual power, awaken it in that cause; never let it be said of thee, he helped to swell the tide of sin by pouring his influence into its channels. If thou art feeble in mental strength, throw not that poor drop into a polluted current. Awake, arise young man! Assume the beautiful garments of virtue. It is easy, fearfully easy, to sin; it is difficult to be pure and holy. Put on thy strength then; let thy chivalry be aroused against error—let truth be the lady of thy love—defend her.—Mrs. Gillman.

BIBLE ANECDOTE.

"A circumstance was lately brought to my knowledge, by a person from the East Indies, which tends to illustrate the importance and value of the Bible; and to show in what various ways its benefits may be displayed when we are not, perhaps, conscious of the happy effects which it is secretly producing. Archdeacon Corrie, now bishop of Madras, was, at the time of which I speak, the chaplain of Allahabad. At that time there was no Hindostanee version of the Scriptures; and it was his custom to translate, on small bits of paper, striking passages into the Hindostanee language, and every morning distribute the papers at his door. Twenty years afterward he received a communication from a missionary at Allahabad, who informed him that a person in ill health had arrived there, and that he had [illegible] He had come to see his friends, and to die among them, after an absence of more than twenty years. The missionary had visited him there several times, and was so astonished at his knowledge of the Scripture, and his impression of its great realities, that he put the question, 'How is it, my friend, that you are so well informed in the sacred Scriptures? You have told me you have never seen a missionary in your life nor any to teach you the way of life and salvation.' And what was his answer, my lord? He put his hand behind his pillow, and drew out a bundle of well worn and tattered bits of paper; and he said, 'From these bits of paper which a Sahib distributed at my door, whom I have never seen since, have I learned all. These papers, which I received twenty years ago, and have read every day till they are tumbled and spoiled, are passages of scripture in the Hindostanee language; from them I have derived all the information of eternal realities which I now possess. This is the source of my information. Thence I have derived my knowledge.'"

From the New York Evangelist.

"IT IS EVEN A VAPOR."

Another year of our short life, where is it? Gone forever. Gone are its joys and its sorrow; its hopes and its disappointments. Gone are its fifty Sabbaths, with their sermons and prayers—with their public opportunities and private instructions. We have now one year more to account for, one year less to live, one less to prepare for our great change. How solemn the thought!

Gone too with the past year are millions of the human family;—shivering poverty and sumptuous affluence; sparkling wit and idolized beauty; the master and his slave; the tenant and his lord; smiling infancy, blooming youth and grey decrepitude; wisdom and folly; genius and stupidity; fading laurels and budding honors. Gone alas! are friends and kindred—some has been rent from home, and flesh from flesh. The wife [illegible]

[illegible]

Aged father, art thou ready? See, but few more sands remain in the glass. Thy sun is just setting. How do the keepers of thy frail house tremble, and the strong men bow themselves! If Christ is yours, all is well. If not, wilt thou not hasten, while yet a ray of hope glimmers upon thy mountain top?

Brother in the midst of life, is thy house in order? I see thy abundance, and hear thy self-gratulations. What if God should say, This night thy soul is required? Could you go in peace? Ah! think how brittle is thy thread, how frail thy tenure. To-morrow may dawn upon thy eternal ruin, and hear the first note of thy ceaseless wail. Thou hast no time to lose.

Thoughtless youth! Buoyant hopes, or bounding health cannot stay the destroyer. They will shrivel under his icy touch. Go ask the tombstones, and they will tell you that the young may die—suddenly, hopelessly. O prepare, thou hast no time to lose—another year may howl thy requiem, and moan thy fearful doom. Do not delay, there's madness in it.

THE SINNER'S BANKRUPT LAW.

The papers contain long lists of the names of individuals who have applied for the benefit of the Bankrupt Law, enacted by Congress for the relief of those who have no means of paying their just dues. This law came into operation on the first of the present month, and already the number of applicants for its aid is exceedingly large.—Counsel is secured, accounts are exhibited, pleadings are made, and men who are indebted in heavy sums and "had nothing to pay," are hoping soon to be realized from their bonds, and to be permitted to commence in business anew.

This is all very natural. Every man who is involved in a hopeless debt, is now advised to "take the benefit of the act."—Those who neglect to do it will be regarded as very impolitic and unwise. "Why," it will be urged, "why remain exposed to the rigor of the law, whose inflexible justice requires the 'uttermost farthing,' or incarceration in a prison, when here is a merciful provision introduced to meet just such cases as yours? True, the law requiring full payment is just and good, but it condemns you to a bondage from which you cannot release yourself. The Bankrupt Act offers a way of relief. Seek its merciful provisions at once."

But there is a Bankrupt Act more important than this. It was enacted in the councils of heaven, for the benefit of men, all of whom had become bankrupts before God. It was signed and sealed in blood on Calvary, more than eighteen hundred years ago. It tells of a provision "to redeem us from the curse of the Law," of One who "though he knew no sin became sin for us, by whose stripes we are healed;" and invites all who will to come, and be "justified from all those things from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses."

Moreover its benefits are freely offered. No expense for commissions, courts, and counsel; no long and tiresome labor in collecting testimony. Jesus, the great Master [illegible] sits ready at all hours to sign, seal, and deliver to every proper applicant, the evidences of a perfect settlement. He himself pays all expenses, and not content with that, He sends agents all about to persuade the miserable bankrupts around them to come and receive the inestimable benefit. All the accumulated debts of a life of prodigality are cancelled, thrown out of sight and cast into the bottom of the sea.

Miserable bankrupts! sinners of every class! will you come and be forgiven? Are you ashamed to do it? Take an example from the long parade of names, not only on the clerk's records, and read publicly in court, but all paraded to public view in the columns of the newspapers! Shall you be ashamed to confess your spiritual bankruptcy, when there are none but bankrupts around you? And that when bankrupts in business are not ashamed to do it before all? Go and hear that Bankrupt Act explained, you will find it to exactly meet your case, for though "your sins be as scarlet they shall become as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool."

WHY I TAKE A RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.

I had rather dispense with the luxuries of tea and coffee, and take my morning and evening beverage from the running stream than do without a religious newspaper. Let me say why:

1. Because I believe with Solomon, that knowledge is better than choice gold. The cost of such a paper is nothing compared with the information I glean from it. I learn more about the geography, the manner and customs of different and distant nations, than I can get from any other source. Besides the knowledge I thus gain of my own country, of its laws, institutions, domestic and foreign intercourse, internal improvement, &c. is great. But more than all, I thus learn about the prosperity of Zion throughout the world.

2. Because I can not repeat the Lord's Prayer intelligently without information.

3. Because I am unwilling to lose the [illegible] I thus obtain.

4. Because of its benefits to my family. [illegible] read and converse about what [illegible]. Thus they acquire a [illegible], become intelligent, and at [illegible] acquire a good moral and [illegible]. In a pecuniary view, [illegible] a year than not take [illegible] view, it is [illegible]

5. Because of its influence on the heart. I take up my paper, and read a stirring sketch on practical godliness—on revivals in progress, or in prospect—on the conversion of the world, and my heart is softened. It beats quicker with sympathy for the perishing; and warmer with love to God and man.

6. Because of its influence on the community. Who can estimate the influence of a well conducted religious newspaper on 3,000 subscribers, and on five times that number of readers.

7. Because, while a religious paper contains tenfold more important matter to me than a paper exclusively secular, it is tenfold more difficult to sustain it.

Secular papers are principally sustained by their advertising patronage. Religious papers publish few advertisements, and consequently derive little revenue from this source.

For these and many other reasons, I take a religious newspaper, deeming it neither just, nor generous to myself, to my family, to the public, or the publisher that he should be left to bear the pecuniary burthen alone.—Boston Recorder.

MORALS OF INFIDELS.

Bolingbroke was a libertine, of intemperate habits and unrestrained lust. Temple was a corrupter of all that came near him—given up to ease and pleasure. Emerson, an eminent mathematician, was "rude, vulgar, and frequently immoral." "Intoxication and profane language were familiar to him. Towards the close of his life, being afflicted with the stone, he would crawl about the floor on his hands and knees, sometimes praying, sometimes swearing." The morals of the Earl of Rochester are well known. Godwin was a lewd man by his confession, as well as the unblushing advocate of lewdness. Shaftsbury and Collins, while endeavoring to destroy the gospel, partook of the Lord's Supper, thus professing the Christian faith for admission to office! Woolston was a gross blasphemer. Blount solicited his sister-in-law to marry him; but, being refused, shot himself. Tindal was originally a Protestant—then turned Papist—then turned Protestant again, merely to suit the times—and was, at the same time, infamous for vice in general, and total want of principle. He is said to have died with this prayer in his mouth: "If there is a God, I desire that he may have mercy on me." Hobbs wrote his Leviathan to serve the cause of Charles I.; but finding him fail of success, he turned it to the defense of Cromwell, and made a merit of this fact to the usurper; as Hobbes himself unblushingly declared to Lord Clarendon. Need I describe Voltaire—prince of scoffers, as Hume was prince of skeptics; in childhood initiated into infidelity; in boyhood, infamous for daring blasphemy; in manhood, distinguished for a malignant and violent temper, for cold-blooded disruptions of all the ties and decencies of the family circle; for the ridicule of whatever was affecting, and the violation of whatever was confidential! Ever increasing in duplicity, and hypocritical management, with [illegible] and practice—those whom his wit attracted, and his [illegible] either disgusted or polluted by his loathsome vices. Lies and oaths in their support were nothing to his maw. Those whom he openly called his friends, he took pains, secretly, to calumniate; flattering them to their faces, and ridiculing and reviling them behind their backs. Years only added stiffness to the disgusting features of his impiety, coldness to his dark malignity, and fury to his impetuous temper. Throughout life he was given up "to work all uncleanness with greediness."—Such was the witty Voltaire, who, in the midst of all his levity, had feeling and seriousness enough to wish he had never been born.—Dwight.

THE POWER OF TRUTH.—Truth, when proclaimed by holy ministers of the cross who live agreeably to the principles of the gospel, glitters like the sun-beams of a summer's day, and is as powerful as a fire, a hammer, and a two-edged sword. May there be thousands of such men to publish it in every part of the world.

THE FOOL'S PENCE.

In the year 183–, in a handsomely furnished parlor which opened out of that noted London gin shop called "The Punch Bowl," sat its mistress, the gaudily dressed Mrs. Crowder, conversing with an obsequious neighbor.

"Why, Mrs. Crowder, I really must say you have things in the first style! What elegant papering! what noble chairs! what a pair of fire screens! all so bright and fresh! Then the elegant stone copings to your windows, and those beautiful French window frames! And you have been sending your daughters to the genteelest boarding school! your shop is the best furnished, and your cellars are the best filled in all this part of Lunnun. Where can you find the needful for all these grand things? Dear Mrs. Crowder, how do you manage?"

Mrs. Crowder simpered, and cast a look of smiling contempt through the half-opened door, into the shop, filled with drouthy customers. "The fool's pence! 'tis the fool's pence that does it for us," she said. And her voice rose more shrill and loud than usual with the triumph she felt.

Her words reached the ears of one of her customers, George Manly, the carpenter, who stood near the counter. Turning his eyes upon those around him, he saw pale, sunken cheeks, inflamed eyes, and ragged garments. He then turned them upon the stately apartment; he looked through the door into the parlor, and saw looking-glasses, and pictures, and gilding, and fine furniture, and a rich carpet, and Miss Lucy in a silk gown, at her piano; and he thought to himself how strange it is! how curious, that all this wretchedness on my left hand should be made to turn into all this finery on my right.

"Well sir—what's for you?" said the same voice that had made the FOOL'S PENCE ring in his ears.

"A glass of gin, ma'am, is what I was waiting for; but I think I have paid the last fool's pence that I shall put down on this counter for many a long day."

Manly hastened home. His wife and his two little girls were seated at work. They were thin and pale, really for want of food. The room looked very cheerless, and their fire was so small as scarcely to be felt: yet the dullest observer would have been struck by the neatness that reigned.

It was a joyful surprise to them his returning so early that night, and returning sober and in good humor.

"Your eyes are weak to-night, wife," said George, "or else you have been crying. I'm afraid you work too much by candle-light."

His wife smiled and said, "working does not hurt my eyes;" and she beckoned to her little boy, who was standing apart in a corner—evidently as a culprit.

"Why, John, what's this I see," said his father. "Come and tell me what you have been doing."

John was a plain spoken boy, and had a straight forward way. He came up to his father, and looked full in his face, and said, "The baker came for his money to night, and would not leave the loaves without it; but though he was cross and rough, he said mother was not to blame, that he was sure that you had been drinking away all the money; and when he was gone, mother cried over her work, but she did not say anything. I did not know she was crying, till I saw the tears dropping on her hands; and then I said bad words, and mother sent me to stand in the corner."

"Tell me what your bad words were, John," said his father, "not swearing I hope?"

"No," said John, coloring; "I said you were a bad man. I said, bad, father."

"And they were bad words, I am sure," said his mother; "but you are forgiven; so now bring me some coal from the box."

George looked at the face of his wife: and as he met the tender gaze of her mild eyes now turned to him, he felt the tears rise in his own. He rose up, and putting money into her hands, he said, "There are my week's wages. Come, come, hold out both hands, for you have not got all yet. Lay it out for the best, as you always do. I hope this will be a beginning of better doings on my part, and happier days on yours."

George told his wife, after the children were gone to bed, that when he saw what the pence of the poor could do towards keeping up a fine house, and dressing out the landlord's wife and daughters, and when he [illegible] plaining Sarah, and his children in want and almost in rags, while he was sitting drinking, night after night, destroying his health and strength; he was so struck with sorrow and shame, that he seemed to come to himself at last. He determined, from that hour, never again to put the intoxicating glass to his lips.

More than a year afterwards, one Sunday afternoon, as Mrs. Crowder of the Punch Bowl, was walking with her daughters to the tea gardens, they were overtaken by a violent shower of rain; and had become at least half drenched, when they entered a comfortable house, distinguished by its comforts and tidiness from all others near it. Its good natured mistress and her two daughters did all they could to dry and wipe away the rain drops and mud splashes from the ladies' fine silk gowns, all draggled and soiled, and to repair, as far as possible, every mischief done to their dresses and persons.

When all had been done, and as Miss Lucy said, they began to look like themselves again, Mrs. Crowder, who was lolling in a large arm chair, amusing herself by a stare at every one and everything in the room, suddenly started forward, and addressing herself to the master of the house, whose Bible and whose face had just caught her eye—"Why, my good man, we are old friends! I know your face, I am certain; still there is some change in you, though I can't exactly say what it is."

"I used to be in ragged clothes and out of health," said George Manly smiling; "now, thank God, I am comfortly clad, and in excellent health."

"But how is it," said Mrs. Crowder, "that we never catch a sight of you now?"

"Madam," said he, "I am sure I wish you well—nay, I have reason to thank you; for words of yours first opened my eyes to my own foolish and wicked course. My wife and children were half naked and half starved, only this time last year. Look at them, if you please, now; for sweet, contented looks, and decent clothes, I'll match them with any man's wife and children.—And now, madam, I tell you as you told a friend of yours one day last year—'tis the fool's pence that have done all this for us. The fool's pence! I ought rather to say, the pence earned by honest industry, and spent so that we can ask the blessing of God upon the pence."

Mrs. Crowder never recovered the one customer she had lost.—South. Lit. Messenger.

Family Devotions.

The good results of "Family devotions," are neither few nor small, and there are but few scenes of more interest than the one where all the members of the family enter heartily into the sacred exercise. Religion is almost sure to exert her controling influence over the hearts and conduct of all who come around the family altar. There are many abuses of this sacred rite, that destroy all its good effects, and render it any thing but pleasant or profitable. Among them we may mention a heartlessness on the part of those who engage in it. God is a spirit and seeketh such to worship him as worship in spirit and truth. An inattention on the part of any of the family is destructive of the good influence that otherwise would result. Irreverence in manner or position are alike reprehensible. To enjoy all the good that properly flows from this sacred exercise, it is necessary for all to enter heartily into the exercise, feeling the need of divine assistance and direction. Heaven is begun in every such place, and all are to a greater or less degree, partakers of the divine presence.—Do all of our readers feel guiltless in this matter?

"Original Papers."

Our friend is mistaken in the allusion to our head of "Original Papers." We were well aware that the "Gleanings from Letters from Palmyra, by Mary," were not, in the strictest sense, "original;" yet, that they are "original," in a more common acceptation of the term, is clear. They are, as their title imports, "Gleanings" from an author,—detached parcels; consequently, as they do not embrace the whole of the author's reasonings, they are rendered "original" to the common newspaper reader, in accordance with the prominent station which has been given them in our columns. We are grateful for the care of our correspondent in this respect, as it exhibits an aversion to "Plagiarism," in the onset.

DR. URE'S DICTIONARY OF ARTS, MANUFACTURES, AND MINES.—We have received the first and second numbers of this work, and from the very slight perusal which we have been enabled to bestow upon it, we are of the opinion that it will prove a valuable auxiliary in the progress of scientific research in this country. Every Mechanic, Artist, Manufacturer, or Student, would no doubt, find in its pages much that would particularly interest them in their various pursuits, and receive additional supplies of knowledge and intellectual cultivation from such a competent source.

The De Ruyter Lyceum.

The Question for Discussion next Monday evening before the Lyceum, "Would the prosperity of the United States be increased by duties on Foreign Importations?" will doubtless elicit much interest, and a full house. It is a question which is receiving much attention throughout our country.

Revival at Pawcatuck, R. I.

Br. John Greene commenced a series of meetings in this village near the last of Dec. which continued about three weeks, with increasing interest. God was evidently with Br. Greene, and near one hundred souls were brought into the liberty of the gospel. Most of whom have followed the example of our blessed Lord in the sacred ordinance of Baptism, and connected themselves with one of the churches in this place.

Revival at Hopkinton City.

The Quarterly Meeting commenced in the 2d S. D. Baptist Church in Hopkinton, about two weeks since, and has continued until now. Some more than forty have been brought into the liberty of the gospel. Fourteen were added to the church last Sabbath, and ten came forward for baptism last fourth day, most of whom have been received into the 2nd S. D. Baptist Church at Hopkinton.

Review of the Prospectus of the English Version of the Bible.

The author of the Prospectus professes a design to present to the English Scholar "a [illegible] expression of the spirit" in the English [illegible] that when words [illegible] original [illegible] or [illegible]

[illegible] translation remain, for this reason, if no other, viz. that it would afford us such an argument for the antiquity of the scriptures, as could not be derived from any other source. Besides, when we meet with a transferred word, about which there is contention, whose prerogative is it to define this word? Doubtless every man has a right to "return to first principles" and define it for himself, so that if we reject the present significant and generally received meaning of such words, and appeal to the original, we only entangle ourselves in a dispute about words which, in the end amount to nothing, except that of destroying the sacredness of the scriptures, and giving to infidels a precedent of making innovations upon God's word.

If the author supposes that a new translation made by any one denomination, to suit its ablest scholars, will be satisfactory, he will find himself very much mistaken. Other denominations will, with equal propriety, claim the privilege of translating the Bible according to the opinions of their best scholars, and if this plan should be adopted, the Baptist would have his Bible, the Presbyterian his, the Methodist his, the Congregationalist his, the Universalist his, &c., and thus you see the awkwardness of the situation in which we should be placed. Whenever a controverted subject should be brought up for investigation, each one would investigate it by his own Bible. One man would say, my Bible reads so—well that is not right, says the other, for my Bible don't read so. What discord would thus be introduced into the Church, and instead of securing the object desired, how would they be entirely destroyed!

Again, why should there be a change of words when the meaning and "spirit" is conveyed in those used? Sure the author does not contend for this, and yet in his very first effort partakes of this defect. In Gen. i: 2, our present translation reads as follows: "And the earth was without form and void." According to the EMENDATION we should read it: "And the earth was desolate and empty." I think a thorough Geologist would object to the introduction of the word "desolate," and as to the word "empty" I should like to know how much better it is than the word "void." I cannot perceive that it falls with any greater force upon the ear, or infuses more "spirit" into the heart. Again, Gen. xxxvii: 3. Instead of reading, "And he made him a coat of many colors." we must read, "And he made him a long robe." Now admitting the last translation to be correct, what is gained by it? Is not the first correct also? Does it not sound as well? Does it not infuse as much "spirit" into the reader's mind? Again, "His horns are like the horns of unicorns." Amendment, "His horns are like the horns of a buffalo." Again, "Praise ye the LORD, for the avenging of Israel, when the people willingly offered themselves." Amendment, "Praise ye JEHOVAH that the leaders led in Israel, that the people willingly offered themselves." Now as I have before hinted, such modernisms, without expressing the meaning any more clearly, or imparting any more "spirit," only strips Christianity of its defenses, and opens the sluice-ways of infidelity.

Religious Discussion.

For the Register.

BROTHER BAILEY,—I see in the Register of Feb. 16th, a letter from Br. N. V. Hull, relating to my published articles on the Imposition of hands. The object of it, he says, is to correct an erroneous impression likely to grow out of my statement as to the cause of bringing the subject before the Conference. I had stated that an existing difference of opinion in the denomination, relative to laying on of hands, was the probable cause of its claiming the attention of the General Conference. Br. Hull says this was not the cause of its being brought before the Conference; "but because of a refusal upon the part of some of our ministers to ordain a brother, (confessedly otherwise acceptable,) because he held to sentiments differing from those of the denomination at large; but not essentially different from those entertained by a number of ministers, and a respectable number of private brethren." And he supposes that any one can satisfy himself as to the true state of the question, &c., by referring to the minutes of that body.

He also charges me with endeavoring to make it appear that himself and other dissenting brethren are innovators, and chargeable with "direful consequences resulting to the denomination for their sin in this case." He considers that in dispensing with the Imposition of hands, they enjoy no more than an implied and generally understood right.—That I have groundlessly and unjustly charged them with innovations; and that this part of the subject must be disposed of and finally settled before he can comply with my wishes in giving his views on the subject of my articles.

It may not be so easy a matter for me to settle and dispose of this part of the subject; but I wish to do what I can in removing obstacles out of his way. In doing this, I must try to meet his charge of misstating the cause of the subject being presented to the Conference. Reference to the Minutes for an explanation of this matter, is of but little, or no use in explaining the cause of its being carried to Conference. The subject was referred without any allusion to the particular case which caused its reference. It was desired by the mover of the resolution, to refer this subject to the Conference, that their decision thereon should be a direction, not only in the existing case, but in all other similar cases which might occur; and it was requested by the candidate that his case should not be mentioned in the communication to Conference. Had Br. Hull been present on this occasion, I think he would understand the subject better, and would not have been so ready to charge me with misstating the case. I know of no better way of now explaining this matter, than by stating facts, which it was not thought necessary to state to the Conference; but which Br. Hull's demand on me makes it necessary to be more generally known.

A short time before the meeting of the Conference, myself and several other brethren were requested to meet with the third church in Brookfield, in order to examine and ordain a brother to the work of the ministry. Previously to the meeting of the council, it was supposed by some of them that the candidate dissented from the general views of the denomination relative to Imposition of hands. The examination on all other points of faith and practice was public, and satisfactory to the council. But in order to exempt the candidate and ourselves from the mortification which we should feel from a public exposure of any important difference of opinion on this point, we conversed with him apart from the assembly. In this conversation we learned that he considered the Imposition of hands as we use the rite, a superstition, held by tradition of our fathers, and that his conscience forbid his using it otherwise than as a church formality, and even in doing so, he should feel bound to state that he used it only as such. As this was the only case of the kind that had occurred in a candidate for ordination, at least, supposed to be so by the council, they were unanimously unwilling to assume the responsibility of ordaining him as an administrator without first being satisfied that they would not incur the censure of the denomination, or grieve some of its members. The council reported their conclusion to the church, and proposed to them that they should ask counsel of the Conference what was proper to be done in this case. The candidate gave the church and counsel to understand, that some of our ministers were of his opinion on this subject, and preferred referring the subject to the presbytery; but consented that they should send the matter to Conference, provided they would send with the first question, the two following which relate to ministers already ordained, and members who have been received without the Imposition of hands.—They were, therefore, added by the request of the candidate. In the proposition to the church to refer the subject to the Conference, the council had no idea of involving any other existing case in their decision than the one on hand; and if it has, it is owing to the candidate's amendments of the church's resolution.

With these facts in view, I think I shall not be charged with a misstatement in saying that the belief that there is not a uniformity of opinion and practice on this point, was the probable reason of its claiming the attention of Conference. I grant that this difference in opinion and practice entertained by certain ministers and churches, of which the council knew nothing except what had been communicated by the candidate, was not so much the cause of referring the request to the Conference, as the case of the candidate; but the dissenting of the candidate on this point was the cause, and the only cause of sending the matter to Conference, and not the refusal of ministers to ordain, as Br. Hull has stated. Will Br. H. say that the subject would have been referred, had this difference of opinion in the candidate not existed? I think not. If a refusal on the part of the council to ordain was the difficulty, why send the matter to the Conference? Could the Conference compel the council to ordain? Certainly not. But to say there was a refusal on the part of the ministers to ordain the brother, is using language too strong. They did not refuse to ordain; but merely declined acting until they could be directed. Thus much for the charge of misstating the matter, and I hope it will suffice.

[illegible] other brethren, the odium of being innovators, and of being the authors of direful consequences to the denomination, I must say that he has been more ready to apply my remark to himself than I have been. In allusion to the difficulties and divisions of the Christian church in time past, I said, "What is matter of history on this subject, should be a sufficient caution to us, not hastily, nor without due consideration, to venture upon the removal of the ancient land-marks of the church. Such as do so, make themselves responsible for all the consequences of such innovations." But I have not charged him or others in acting thus. Br. H. will admit that if it had been the former uniform practice of our ministers to impose their hands upon the baptized candidates for membership in the churches; and if there be now ministers in our churches who do not do it; that, then, a change in our administrations has been introduced; and if this change has been introduced without the knowledge and consent of the denomination, he will also admit that it is an innovation, and that the authors of this change were the innovators. But I profess not to know who they are.

I believe that Br. Hull has no evidence that there was always a difference of opinion on this subject in our denomination. I admit that, as it respects candidates for membership, since my acquaintance with the churches, it has been an understanding, that although it was the avowed usage of the denomination for hands to be imposed upon such; yet it was not considered absolutely essential to their reception. But this exemption from it was allowed only where the candidate had conscientious scruples concerning it, and I am very doubtful about its being so understood.

During a connection of about twenty years with the churches in Rhode Island, I recollect but one case in which the candidate did not choose to pass under hands, and this circumstance was the subject of many remarks by members, who considered him unsound in his views of christian duty; and within a few months he gave proof of this, by attaching himself to a pedo-baptist church.

But although this indulgence, (if it should be so termed,) was allowed in a private member, I do not believe that it would have been as easily granted to a candidate for the ministry; because the influence of ministers is believed to be much greater than that of private members, and that which an administrator declines doing for a candidate, must of necessity be omitted by him. However much Br. Hull may be startled at the idea that the omission of the imposition of hands by an administrator, is an innovation, I see not how he can avoid the conclusion. For even if it be, as he maintains, the enjoying of an implied, and generally understood right, still it is a right that our ministers did not formerly enjoy, and it is, therefore, an innovation. So far as this omission extends, it produces a change in the practical features of the denomination, by lopping off a rite usually practised among them. Although the omission of this rite may be an implied right of the candidate for membership, it does not follow that an administrator, or candidate for the ministry, has a generally implied right to omit it in his ministrations. But whether those administrators enjoy a right in omitting it, or suffer a wrong, it is not my place to decide.

In offering my views of the Imposition of hands, I have complied with the personal request of Br. Hull, without any design of charging upon him, or any other brother, a "sin," or wilful wrong in the course they may have taken on this subject. I should consider myself unfortunate if I should see that I have expressed myself in a manner calculated to give him, or others, the erroneous impressions which I understand by his letter he has imbibed by what I have written.

I shall be glad to see what he may think proper to write on the subject to which my former articles are devoted.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

The packet ship Hendrich Hudson, Capt. Morgan, arrived at this port on Tuesday last, and brings intelligence from Europe up to the 17th of January.

Capt. Morgan says that of 106 voyages he has made across the Atlantic, this last was by far the stormiest. From the 6th to the 14th of Feb., the gales he encountered were terrific.

There have been several other unimportant arrivals since our last, but the Hendrich Hudson brings the latest news. The Caledonia has been hourly expected at Boston for the last ten days past, and her non-arrival causes great anxiety. The belief that she was lost in the late gale, is generally entertained.

[illegible]

The Columbus arrived on Jan. 15th, and carried accounts of the Creole case. The Times declares the claim for restitution "the most audaciously untenable" it is possible to imagine.

Parliament was to meet on the 3rd ult.

There is no later China news. The Queen has granted a portion of the Canton ransom to the troops employed in the attack.

The advices from Afghanistan were unsatisfactory. The Anglo-Indian forces had been defeated in a battle with the Ghilzies, with great loss of life.

The British Government had interposed to adjust the quarrel of etiquette between France and Spain.

Lord Ashburton was to embark for New York, on board a steam-frigate, about the 24th of Jan. His stay in the U. S. was expected to be very brief.

Mr. Everett, the American minister, left London on the 5th of January, on a visit to Lord Ashburton.

There appears to have been a diplomatic quarrel between the governments of France and Russia; manifesting itself in several points of etiquette, but not the less adverse to a condition of perfect amity.

The Creole Case.

The letter of instruction from Mr. Webster to Mr. Everett, given on Monday, in obedience to a call of the Senate, excites a deep feeling of surprise and indignation, in the minds of a large portion of Northern members, of all parties. The doctrines of the letter, from such a source are startling enough. Had Calhoun uttered them, it would, "vox, et preterea nihil." Both Calhoun and Walker of Miss., commended Mr. Webster for them, in the highest terms.

Washington's Birth Day.

Tuesday being the birth day of Washington, both Houses adjourned, "to contemplate his character," as Mr. Saltonstall very quaintly said, with his gravest face, and most solemn tone, in moving an adjournment.

Steam Frigate—David Gelston.

Wednesday the Senate passed a bill appropriating $220,000 to build a bomb and shot proof steam frigate, on Steven's plan, for harbor defense, which was also read twice in the House. The bill to adjust the accounts of David Gelston, formerly Collector of N. Y., was also passed.

Navigation of the Mississippi.

Mr. Benton presented an important memorial for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and its tributaries, which states that more than $700,000 worth of property was lost the last year from obstructions in these rivers, which might be removed at a comparatively small cost.

The Value of Coins.

A bill to change the legal value of the pound sterling from $4,87 to $4,84, its real value, is also before the Senate. It appears from the assays, that nearly all foreign coins are valued too high by our present laws.

The Caroline Affair.

Mr. Allen, of Ohio, offered a resolve calling for information as to the progress of the negotiation on the Caroline case, and intimated pretty strongly his opinion that the matter was neglected. But Messrs. Calhoun and Rives were suddenly taken with a fit of "delicacy about embarrassing the President by calls while the negotiation was pending:" and the motion was tabled.

Curtailment of Expenses.

The House after passing a resolve calling for information on the tobacco trade, and some minor matters, took up the question of diminishing the expenses of the House, and after some very dull wrangling, voted to discharge two or three useless clerks.

Appropriation Bill.

The civil and diplomatic bill was then resumed, and some progress made in it.

N. E. Bounday.

On Saturday the President communicated his refusal to give any information as to the state of negotiations concerning the N. E. Boundary. The truth is, none has been made, and none is likely to be very soon. An hour was devoted to "retrenchment," when a multitude of private bills were twice read, and then came a curious scene. It appears that a democratic clerk in the State Department, without authority, had given Blair and Rives, a MS. copy to print the census. They have done it, and claim their pay; and to show how well they could do it, they laid a copy on each member's table, the members having been previously supplied with copies by Mr. Allen, the legal printer. A long party war of words consumed the day, till the affair was referred to a select committee, and the House adjourned.

Resignation of Mr. Pierce—Veto Power.

To-day, in the Senate, Pierce of N. H., a valuable business member, resigned his seat. The particular cause is not stated, but is supposed to have reference to existing divisions in his party, in New Hampshire. Mr. Pierce's resolution, calling for more full information concerning the N. Y. Custom House, was taken up and passed—after which Mr. Calhoun made a long speech chiefly in defense of the veto power, which he insisted was a popular element, tending to make the will of the entire people more influential over our government!

Mr. Clay on the Tari —His Resignation.

To-morrow Mr. Cl gives us his great speech on the tarif so that I shall have the opportunity of hea ng the two together. Mr. Clay's resignation [illegible] the 1st of April, be which time he hopes to carry some of his favorite schemes, and then retire under cover of the glory he will gain by then.

Information about the War Department.

In the House, a resolution was offered by Mr. McClellan, of N. Y., calling for a report from the War Department, concerning some $2 000 extra pay allowed to Gen. Scott, for his services in removing the Cherokee Indians. It seems that Messrs. Poinsett, Bell, and Grundy, when in office, rejected this claim as contrary to law, (as it is, beyond doubt,) and it was allowed by the chief clerk, while acting Secretary, just after the dissolution of the Harrison cabinet. After various efforts to amend, and defeat or delay the resolution, it was adopted, 125 to 26—and the friends of Scott got another adopted, calling for a report of all extra allowances to officers in the Department, and in the army since 1835, hoping to cover up one sin under a cloud of other peccadillos.

Another Petition for the Dissolution of the Union.

The states were then called for petitions, beginning with Iowa. A great number on the usual topics were offered and disposed of, without remark, till Mr. Giddings of Ohio presented one from a large number of respectable citizens of Ashtabula, O., praying for the dissolution of the Union, on account of the oppressive control of the slave power over the government. This produced a fever at once. The reception of the petition was refused 26 to 116, the House being very thin; and then Kennedy, of Md., moved a resolution to the effect that such petitions were oppressive to the House, and very censurable, and that any member who offered them, hereafter, would be liable to the censure of the House. Pending a motion to consider this resolution the House adjourned in great confusion.

Death of the Hon. Lewis Williams.

Return, again, to the previous week.—On Monday morning Lewis Williams, of N. C., the Father of the House, who for 27 years has been a member of it, was well, and in his place. That evening he was attacked with the pleurisy, and on Wednesday morning was called to his account. He was a man of excellent judgment, amiable manners, and pure life; an esteemed member, for several years of the Presbyterian church. No member was more universally respected and loved. His death was announced on Thursday, by Mr. Graham, in the Senate, and Mr. Rayner in the House, with appropriate eulogies on his life and character.

Congressional Temperance Society.

On the same evening, the Hall was again crowded, with members, citizens, and strangers, to attend the first public meeting of the Congressional Total Abstinence Society. The brilliant audience was detained till a late hour, by the varied eloquence of Briggs and Burnell of Mass., Dr. Sewall of this city, Rev. J. Marsh of N. Y., Gov. Gilmer of Va., Mr. Neff, a reformed drunkard from Wilmington, and another from Baltimore, Marshall of Ky., and John H. W. Hawkins, now of Boston.

New-York Legislature.

IN SENATE.

Repeal of the Registry Law.

Feb. 24.—The bill to repeal the New York Registry Law passed the Senate, without division, and henceforth, unless the "One-day Election Bill" is passed, the city returns to her three days of confusion.

Apart from this, little has been accomplished either in the Senate or Assembly.

Feb. 28.—The bill to repeal the act for the better organization of criminal courts in the city of New York, was passed by a vote of 16 to 10.

The bill repealing the Registry sections of the City Election Law of 1840 has been passed and signed by the Governor.

Mr. Dickinson introduced on Monday, in the Senate, a bill making the New York and Erie Rail Road a State work, which was sent to the rail road Committee by a vote of 13 to 12.

The Senate has passed a bill incorporating the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York city.

IN ASSEMBLY.

Chemung Canal.

Feb. 26.—The resolution of Mr. Hathaway calling upon the Comptroller for information respecting the Chemung Canal loan, was discussed, but the house adjourned without acting thereon. A disposition seemed to be manifested by some members to prevent any inquiry into the matter, though a motion to lay it on the table was lost by a strong vote.

Boston and Albany Rail Road.

The Directors of the Western Rail Road Company have invited the Legislature of this State to meet that of Massachusetts, at Springfield, in Mass., on Thursday next, and therefore the Legislature adjourns over from the third to the fourth of March, to allow those to accept of the invitation who are thus disposed.

State Prison Labor.

Mr. Wier from the committee on State prisons, has presented a report to the House containing the opinions of the committee on the subject, and presenting many facts and reasons for the change prayed for by the mechanics.

A General Tax.

A general tax of one mill on the dollar, is now talked of as being inevitable. Hints to that effect are thrown out in many quarters, and not a few are open in their avowal that this is the only alternative. The result of the Chemung Canal loan will determine future action on this subject.

Bills Introduced.

Mr. Seymour, by bill, to authorize the Superintendent of Common Schools to [illegible] tribute one copy of Thomas Sewall's book, entitled "the Physical effects of Intemperance," to each School District in the State. A motion was made to order this bill to a third reading, but objection was made.

Mr. Weir reported in favor of the bill for the repeal of certain portions of the act entitled an act to create a fund for the reformation of juvenile delinquents in the city of New York.

News of the Day.

Havanna.—By Havanna papers of the 15th of February, received at Charleston, we learn that the British Mail Steamer had been ordered by the authorities not to leave the port, as her mails had not passed regularly through the Post Office. The Governor stated that if she did not comply, he would sink her as she passed the Moro; and there was a rumor that he had sent word to the Captain that unless he did so forthwith, he should order him to be imprisoned. It seems that the terrible story about the insurrection of the blacks of the island, and their murder of the whites, was an entire fabrication.—N. Y. Tribune.

Wonderful Contrast.—About 47 years ago, in 1795, Alleghany, Washington, and Fayette counties, were full of distilleries, and an immense quantity of whiskey was made and sold. The United States, in order to raise a revenue, made a law to tax it. The people refused to pay, rebelled and raised an army, called the Western Insurrection army, and marched to Pittsburg. Gen. Washington sent an army of about 3,000 U. S. troops and volunteers to suppress it. They arrived when the Whiskey army disbanded. In the year 1815 and '16, the United States put on a direct tax, and perhaps then we had 1500 stills in Washington and Alleghany counties. Now there is not perhaps 15 still-houses in operation in the two counties.—A few days ago a gentleman, who was U. S. Deputy Collector in Washington county in 1816, informed us that there was then 976 still-houses taxed and $76,000 collected of taxes for the U. S.; and now, perhaps, there is scarce ten distilleries in that county.—Pittsburg (Pa.) Gazette.

Mr. Cobb, the late Chamberlain of Albany.—The Albany Evening Journal says of Mr. Cobb, who was lately announced as a defaulter to a considerable amount,—"He was led into these pecuniary difficulties by a too yielding nature. The desire to help and oblige friends occasioned his embarrassment. He had no right, however, to use the public monies, nor shall we attempt to justify or excuse his doing so.—But he has honorably paid the debt due the City, and unless his valuable property is sacrificed, will honestly pay all his debts, and, we hope, have something left. Papers which have spoken of Mr. Cobb's defalcation are requested, as a matter of justice, to state the fact of his having paid his entire debt to the city."

A New County.—The Committee on the division of towns and counties, in the Senate, have reported in favor of establishing a new county from portions of Chautauque, Cattaraugus and Erie counties. It is to include the towns of Hanover, Villenova, Sheridan, Arkwright, and Pomfret, in Chautauque; the towns of Dayton, Perrysburgh, and Persia, in Cattaraugus; and the towns of Evans, Brandt, and Collins, in Erie county.—N. Y. Jour. of Com.

Major Reuben Woodworth, a Revolutionary soldier, died at Salina on the 15th ult. He was at the capture of Burgoyne, and in several other celebrated engagements.

A son of John C. Spencer, Secretary of War, has been arrested at Albany for forgeries amounting to over a thousand dollars, committed on his own father—the proprietors of our City Hotel and a broker in Broadway being the victims.

The total amount of school districts in Ohio is 4,490. The total amount of public money from all sources, applicable to the schools, is $281,815. This is six per cent interest on a capital of $4,690,000.—Ohio is well endowed, therefore, in her school fund.

The total cost of the steamship Mississippi is stated in a communication from the Navy Department to Congress, to have been $519,032 67, and that of the Missouri, $553,850 32.

During the present month, 12 prisoners at Sing Sing prison have been discharged by expiration of sentence—and on the 18th inst. there remained 741 men and 76 women—total 817.

The Sabbath and its Observance.—We learn with great pleasure that the Canal Boat Companies, on the great Pennsylvania line, have come to a determination to discontinue running on the Sabbath day.—The same is, we learn, to be done by the Boston and Providencee Rail Road and also by the Massachusetts Western Rail Road from Boston to Albany.

These are charming signs of the times. If we [illegible] become a nation of sober people, [illegible] who "keep holy the Sabbath day" (!) then may we hope, and [illegible] Republic will survive [illegible] time, and the corruptions [illegible] a light ahead! A light [illegible] can neither make nor [illegible] Chronicle.

[illegible]—A heart rending [illegible] this week, which [illegible] of the Hon. Charles [illegible] of the Council [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] shortly after the ad- [illegible]

A discussion of a heated character arose upon a motion made in the Council to reconsider a vote by which the nomination of Enos T. Barker, as Sheriff for the county of Grant, was rejected a few days since. During the progress of this discussion, some rather violent words passed between Mr. Arndt and Vineyard. The first conceiving himself to have been insulted, approached Mr. Vineyard after adjournment for the purpose of seeking an explanation—a slight personal rencontre then took place, when the latter drew a pistol from his pocket and fired. Mr. Arndt reeled for a few paces, then sunk to the floor, and almost immediately expired, having been shot through the heart.—Wiskonsan Enquirer, 12th inst.

Uncertainty of Life.—At Woodstock, Brock District, U. C., on the 19th ult., Wm. Burtch, Esq., was united in marriage to Sarah Hatch. The former died of scarlet fever on the 31st ult., and the latter died of the same disease on the 4th inst.

From Mexico.—It gives us great pleasure to announce the arrival in this city, from Mexico, of young Combs, one of the fated Santa Fe expedition, in good health. He left the City of Mexico, on the 27th ult., and reached New Orleans yesterday.

The substance of the intelligence he brings in relation to his comrades is, that when he left the main body of the Santa Fe prisoners were within two days march of the capital. Mr. Kendall was with the company, in excellent health. He was probably in the City of Mexico by the 1st inst., and we have every reason to believe, will be in this city by the first of next month. Mr. Combs met Mr. McRae, the bearer of despatches to the American Minister, at Perote, about half way between Vera Cruz and Mexico.—N. O. Picayune.

Miami Indians.—These are the only Indians in the State of Indiana. In November, 1840, a treaty was concluded with them, by which they ceded their lands to the Government. This treaty was modified by the Senate, but has since been ratified by the Indians—so that the last Indian title to lands in this State is fully extinguished.

From the report of the sub agent to the commissioner of Indian affairs, we learn the following:

The Miami's decline being numbered, amount to but about 600. They refuse to encourage schools, and the money paid them by the Government promotes laziness, prodigality, and intemperance: but the iron, steel, salt and farming utensils do them much good. All their labour, however is performed by whites. But little use is made of their mill, as they are to indolent to carry to and from it. Principally, on account of their intemperance, the tribe are diminishing yearly. More than half the adults that die, perish by the hands of their fellow Indians. Frequently members of the same family destroy each other during their scenes of drunkenness and riot.

A Horrid Scene.—The Gazette, published at Haverhill, Mass., gives the following particulars of a shocking affair which took place last Thursday—another sad consequence of rum selling:—Boston Times.

The wife of Mr. Abijah Kelley, of this town, was found in the fire-place quite dead, where she had probably fallen while employed about the fire, and in a state of intoxication! Her family were absent, and she was first discovered by her daughter, but while we were there a husband and a son were brought home, and the reader can better imagine their feelings than if we were to portray them. There lay the wretched wife and mother, whose body was shockingly disfigured by the flames,—her head, face, and arms, literally roasted! It may be unnecessary to say that a bottle and tin pail, partly filled with rum, was found in her room, and that she had been seen, in the course of the day, coming from a neighboring grog-shop with a tin pail apparently the worse for rum.

How to Disperse a Crowd.—Late the other evening, when quite a large collection of persons, attracted mostly, without doubt, from curiosity, had gathered in front of the house of Mr. W., with whom Elder Knapp resides, "mine host" presented himself before the multitude, and addressed them in this wise: "My friends, if you desire to see Mr. Knapp, you are informed that he is within, and both he and myself would be pleased to receive as many of you as my house will hold. And such particularly as feel the need of his prayers, will be made most heartily welcome." The crowd dispersed in double quick time.—Boston Trav.

A New Society we see is proposed in one of the papers, and if it secures the patronge now engaged by the Washingtonian Temperance Associations, we shall not be long in debt to Foreign countries, or to Banks, or to each other. It is a Society for the promotion of economy, and the restricting of our patronage to articles of American manufacture. Only let regard to economy be generally put in practice, and the insolvent and loafing go to work, and the cry of hard times will soon be silenced. Prodigality is at the bottom of most of our pecuniary troubles, with a disposition to get along any way, but by honest and persevering lobor.—N. Y. Bap. Reg.

A Drunkard now can have no peace of his life until he join the ranks of the Washingtonians. He used to have the support of his companions to cheer him in his sottish practices, but now he must take his glass in loneliness, and then he must endure the obtrusive gaze and unremitted solicitations of the Washingtonians in every dram shop. His former companions, instead of giving him countenance, entreat him to quit, and take the pledge, and he can have no peace until he does it. The papers from all directions, north and south, [illegible] are full of the triumphs of the Washingtonian band. Where will the thing end?—N. Y. Bap. Reg.

The Cunard Line.—It has been alleged that this line has made a losing business of it. But it is said this is a mere hoax, and that the Bostonians have a design in it to deter the New Yorkers from engaging in starting a line from Manhattan, which they have been long seriously talking about. The Bostonians secretly have it in view to be before them in starting one of their own. They have opened an avenue by rail-road, to divert a great portion of western trade and now with a line of steamers across to Old England, they will maintain the chain as far west as the city of Chicago.—N. Y. Bap. Reg.

Charles Dickens.—The reception of this gentleman in the city of New York, could not have cost less than $50,000, taking the two balls and dinner, with expenditures for dress and ornaments! Only think of this—how cheerfully the fashionable world, spend their money for their momentary graification, (the enjoyment of the feast of the eye and the palate, and the interchange of a few complimentary speeches.) and how hard to get the same sum, for the cause of Missions or the Bible, after a years indefatigable labor by the press and agents! When shall we approach the liberality of the world, in our donations to the cause of Christ?—N. Y. Bap. Reg.

Property of the Reformed Dutch Church.—It is probable that many of our readers will feel an interest in knowing, as early as may be, the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Smith Harpending, et al., vs. the Reformed Dutch Church in the city of New York, The complaints, by their Bill in Chancery, demanded of the respondents on account of the sales, rents and profits, and title deeds, of the value of property in the 3d ward, held by the Corporation of the Reformed Dutch Church. They claim as defendants and heirs of John Haberden, who in 1696 was the owner of this property, then known as the Shoemakers' Field. The decision of the Supreme Court was given to-day, by Judge Catron, in favour of the respondents on all the points necessary to a complete disposal of the case. The respondents who actually held under a will of John Haberden, as it is generally understood, yet rested their cause entirely on the Statute of Limitations. They have been in exclusive possession, adverse to all other claimants, for fifty years before the commencement of this suit. The Court sustains this plea—chiefly, as I understand it, that the Courts of the State of New York have put such a construction upon their Statute Limitations, that a mere naked possession for the requisite term gives a complete title. With regard to a number of nice points, which were made with great ingenuity and sustained with a vast display of legal lore by the learned council for the demandants, the Court gave no opinion. The Judge said this Court always held itself bound by the settled decisions of State Courts in the construction of State laws.—So the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.—Cor. of J. of Com.

From the Boston Times.

TERRIFIC ACCIDENT.

Last evening, the Roman Catholic Relief Society held a meeting in the Hall over James L. Ridule's auction store, and when about to adjourn at 11 o'clock, the sleepers upon which the floor was laid, broke through and in its descent took the floor below with it, hurling about two hundred men among the ruins!

At the first crash, many jumped from the windows in the second story, and we regret to learn that a Mr. Burns of South Boston, had both legs broken two others whose names we could not learn, received serious injuries.

A number of others are reported to be more or less injured.

The noise of the crashing timbers, and the cries of the wounded and terrified inmates, soon drew together a large concourse of people, who tendered efficient aid in extricating the unfortunate sufferers from the ruins.

When we consider the circumstances, the number of people congregated, and the distance they fell, we may look upon their escape as almost miraculous. Five hundred people were congregated in the Hall, the majority of whom were on that part of the floor which was supported from below, and who looked on the disaster, expecting every minute to share the fate of those who had fallen. The building is owned by the heirs of the late R. D. Tucker.

We understand that the meeting was held for the purpose of taking into consideration the conduct of some of the Catholics who were engaged in the late riot at St. Mary's Church. The names of those injured as far as we can learn are Patrick McLaughlin, who jumped from a third story window and striking a large swinging sign, carried it with him in his descent and striking on the sidewalk, was taken up insensible. Patrick Arley had his leg broken, and a man by the name of Fleming was somewhat injured.

From the New Orleans Picayune of Feb. 19.

Fire—Frightful and Extraordinary Accident.—Between twelve and one o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out in the three story brick block on the corner of Front Levee and Benjamin streets, belonging to Peters and Millard and Mr. Sewell. The fire originated in the north end, in the room occupied by Miguel Coulon, as a carabet and dancing house, destroyed that and the adjoining building, and partly destroyed the third. Loss [illegible]

A most frightful accident and miraculous escape took place at this fire, and rendered doubly remarkable by the fact that the object of them had been married only a few hours before [illegible] from his bridal bed [illegible] night [illegible] a member of [illegible] the roof of one of the buildings [illegible] the joists of the third story, in the midst of flames and dense smoke, but was fortunately rescued, and we are informed is in a fair way to recover. The roof was damp, and he slipped, falling rapidly over the eave, and disappearing among the flames and smoke of the builing already in ruins.

The frightful fact was passed about like electricity among his brave companions, who rushed desperately into the burning house, and, as Providence directed, found and rescued their unfortunate and helpless friend. He was hanging senseless across a burnt beam, his limbs dangling in the smoke.—His clothes, being saturated with water partially protected him from the fire; and as his coat was torn, it is supposed he was caught by something that broke his fall, and probably saved his life. It was a most alarming and extraordinary circumstance, and the escape seems almost a miracle.

Trouble with the English Steamers in Havana.—Capt. Morris, of the U. S. mail brig Hayne, in Charleston, reports that when he left Havana, on the 15th inst., there was a "considerable excitement" there, owing to a difference of opinion or some other difference between the Governor General and the British steam packet. The latter was going off without passing her mails through the Post Office, according to the laws of the place. She was stopped, and the Governor General said or swore that if she moved out he would sink her as she passed the Moro.

The matter was still unadjusted when the Hayne left—the British steamer was lying very quiet, and nobody knew how it would end. Rumor said the Governor General had sent the Captain of the steamer word, that unless he complied with the laws, he would imprison him forthwith. There are the seeds of trouble in this, and we may as well keep an eye on the progress of Britsh "enterprise" in Cuba. It is quite as interesting as their doings in China just now.

PROSPECTUS
VOLUME III.

The 3rd Volume of the Seventh-Day Baptist Register will be published weekly, at De Ruyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on an imperial sheet, at $2 per annum, payable in advance, or in three months.

It will continue to be the organ of the Seventh-Day Baptist denomination, and contend for the truths of the Bible as held by them. It will embrace in its object the whole range of Christian doctrines and duties, and the various benevolent enterprises of the day. It will be our object to make the "Register" interesting and profitable to all classes of its patrons. We assure those of all denominations who patronize us, that we intend to furnish them with an evangelical paper, which, while it is the organ of a particular branch of the church of God, will "contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." Its columns will be open for a fair discussion of the doctrines advocated by it. In all our labors we hope to be guided by the spirit of the Gospel, and if we can be successful in promoting practical religion, and induce men to love God, our highest wishes will be gratified.

We are grateful for the approbation and support of our readers, and hope to receive their continued support. All who will aid us in procuring subscribers, and making remittances, shall be duly rewarded.

A portion of our columns will be devoted to Literature, Science, Agriculture, and General Intelligence.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

DEVOTED TO FREE DISCUSSION, AND TO THE DIFFUSION OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE, MISCELLANEOUS LITERATURE AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

This publication has been before the public for nearly a year, and its merits are to well understood, to need an extended notice. It is unique in its design, its columns being thrown open to correspondents on both sides of disputed questions of public policy. All party discussions are rigorously excluded; and it is believed that no other paper contains in so condensed a shape, a greater variety of valuable and interesting matter. It is conducted by John A. Dix, Alonzo Potter T. Romeyn Beck, Gideon Hawley, W. Olcott, Amos Dean and Edward C. Delevan.

Published monthly in the city of Albany, by Charles Van Benthuysen, No. 20 Market street. Publication day, 15th of each month.

The 1st volume ends with the March No. The first No. of the 2d volume will be issued on the 15th of April, 1842.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists [illegible] to the present time, giving [illegible] including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED,

In Truxton on the 2d inst, by Elder Russel G. Burdick, Mr. BENJAMIN DENNIS, of Lyons, Wayne Co., and Miss POLLY M. FORD, of Truxton.

DIED,

In Truxton, on the 7th inst., OLIVER CURTIS, aged 21. He was the oldest son of the late Elder Ephraim Curtis, and inherited to a great degree, the excellent mind and goodness of heart of his father. For about two years he had been a follower of the Lamb, and gave good evidence of union with him, and love for his cause He has left behind a young widow in deep affliction, with whom he had lived about two months. His brothers and only sister who looked to him for help and advice now feel their loss.

In Richburgh, Allegany Co. N. Y. on the 26th ult., Mrs. ABIGAIL GRAND, aged 105 years, 5 months and 5 days. She maintained her mental faculties till within a few days of her death, and died in full assurance of bliss beyond this "vale of tears." She was born in Ipswich Mass., was married at 20, became a widow at 62, removed from Mass. in 1753 to N. H., from N. H. to Vermont in 1774, lived in Vermont till 1810, from that time has been a resident of this State. She has lived in the enjoyment of religion for something like 85 years. Truly age does not exempt us from death. Com.

NEW TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT.

J. M. LETTS,

WOULD return thanks for the patronage he has received from his numerous friends and customers. ☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond.; Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

 To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES'

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

CAPITAL,

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!

Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.

CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840, COMBINING

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE

SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

POETRY.

For the Register.

Memento.

Lines suggested by the death of Esther, consort of L. D. Ayres.

When your sad letter sorrowing I read,
Filled with mementoes of the loved and dead,
So vividly the past before me came
With its bright visions, clustering round her name,
That past was all too present to admit
The heart to dwell on what it chose forget.
And your request—Oh, how it echoed then!—
"A tribute to her memory from the pen."
What thoughts it roused, what agony it stirred,
As if her death-groan, or her knoll, I heard.
Gone! but the sound pass'd o'er me, and it seem'd
So like the "baseless fabric" of a dream
I could not grasp it.

There I saw her still
Such as I knew her first, when toward the Hill
Of Science she her steps with ardor turn'd,
And her young mind for truth's high Temple yearn'd.
O how familiar on my ear they fell—
Those accents I had treasured but too well!
Wont to rehearse the deeply subtle lore,
By application won from wisdom's store.
For well she knew, and loved those truths to scan
Which shew the handy works of God to man.

Yet more! how soon she gave her youthful heart
Unto the Savior! never more to part.
Blest offering, that reaps even in its bloom
The gift unspeakable; a life beyond the tomb.
And must I learn to speak of her as dead,
Whom first I learn'd to love, when first I led,
With all a teacher's fondness, side by side,
Those gentle pupils, once my care, my pride!

No! let me love her still! and still believe
That love returned. Then wherefore shall I grieve!
With those who grieve. With him whose spirit lone
Craves a sad requiem for a partner gone.
The bride, so soon at Heaven's high altar crowned
Where victor wreaths, and angel harps abound.
Think of her thus. Tax not the bleeding heart,
To trace the faintest line upon that chart
By hope projected, and by fancy fill'd
In long perspective. Happiness prevail'd
Thro' all its lights and shades; nor dreamed the soul
What floods but just beneath that vision roll'd.

Turn from the picture; it is ever thus,
Earth claims its kindred earth, and dust its dust.
So, from the borders of the better land
The gentle whisper of that spirit band
Comes to the child of earth—"away, away,
Fold not thy pinions in a house of clay,
Haste to thy home, thy kindred, Heaven has need,
Of thy meek service." And the spirit freed
Obeys its summons.

Say, when o'er thy soul
The swollen waters of affliction roll'd
Even when upon the anchor thou didst rest,
And oft, the rod that smote thee, calmly kiss'd,
Did not, even then, the bitterness of death
Prey on thy heart-strings with her latest breath!
And could I still prolong that mournful strain,
Or seek to wake its agony again!
No—by the love you bear her—bless His name
Who gave—and took her to himself again.

THE PRAIRIE.

BY L. F. THOMAS.

Not the least remarkable features in the Great Western Valley, are the Prairies, which are found in every direction over the face of its vast territory. They are of two kinds, the swelling or rolling, and the level or flat. The former consists of undulating fields, broken into swells, or reaches of various lengths and breadths, extending sometimes to an altitude of sixty or seventy feet. Between these swells are sloughs, or "sloos," which are generally marshy, and in many instances contain small lakes or pools, and some that are dry, exhibit the appearance of funnels, and answer a similar purpose in carrying off water into the caverns beneath, the existence of which is indicated by the soil above. The flat prairies are plains of rich alluvion, grown with long lank grass, and occasionally presenting a lake, and often studded here and there with groves of wild crab apple, and clusters of forest trees, that look like emerald isles in a sea of waving green.

The Prairies are of various extent, from a mile to hundreds of miles. The largest is in the far off West—the home of the Buffalo and the red hunter. Wherever they are partly cultivated as most of them are in the "States," and where the annual fires are discontinued, they soon grow up with timber. Their soil is, with very few exceptions, entirely alluvial, and yields immense crops of Indian corn and other coarse grain. When they exist in the neighborhood of settlements, they afford excellent pasturage for horses and cattle, and fine ranges for swine, and are traversed by herds of deer, the number of which increases near the plantations, when not in too close proximity, as their greatest enemies, the black and prairie wolves, decrease as cultivation advances. Wild turkies, ducks, prairie fowls or grouse, and quails and rabbits, also abound on the prairies, and afford great amusement to sportsmen. Numerous other animals, as the gopher, the [illegible] raccoon, &c. &c., are found [illegible] the borders.

The wanderer over these wild savannahs, will sometimes be [illegible] by a sound, as of hoofs on the [illegible], and anon, a noble [illegible] will bound past him, [illegible] are tracking their game, and urging the wild chase.

Some theorists believe the prairies to have been, very anciently, the beds of the lakes or of the sea; this opinion finds arguments in the alluvious character of their soil, and in the marine shells, that are invariably found imbedded in the limestone of adjacent bluffs.

When the grass is thoroughly ripe, in the fall, towards the close of November, most of the prairies are burned. The fire sometimes originates by accident, but more often from the design of the hunters to facilitate them in the destruction of game. The dry grass, which then is often as high as the head of a man on horseback, burns with a fierce and terrible rapidity, and extends the flames for miles in a few minutes, impressing the beholder with the idea of a general conflagration. If the wind chances to be high, tufts of the burning materials dart like flaming meteors through the air, and, far as the eye can reach, a pall of black smoke stretches to the horizon, and overhangs the scene, while all below is lighted up, and blazing with furious intensity, and ever and anon, flaming whisps of grass flash up, revolving and circling in the glowing atmosphere, and lending to the imagination a semblage of convict-spirits tossing in a lake of fire. The birds startled and bewildered, scream wildly, and tumble and roll about above the flames—the affrighted deer leaps from its covert and courses madly away, and the terrified wolf, forgetful of the chase, runs howling in an adverse direction.

When an experienced hunter finds himself upon a prairie to which fire has been applied, he immediately kindles a fire near him, as did the old trapper in Cooper's novel of the "Prairie," and the wind bears the flames onward, burning a path before him, which he follows to a place of safety, and thus escapes a horrible fate, that but for his sagacity would have been inevitable. A prairie on fire can sometimes be seen at a distance of fifty miles.

The fire continues until the grass is all consumed, and, not unfrequently, it is carried by the wind into the adjacent forest, which it blasts and devastates until checked by a water course. Early in the spring the prairies renew their verdant clothing, and long before their next autumnal burning, all vestiges of the preceding conflagrations are gone, unless, perhaps, some worm-eaten and sapless tree in one of the island-like clusters, may show, by its blackened trunk and leafless branches, that the flames have been there.

In no possible condition can the prairies be seen without exciting feelings of a peculiar and lively interest. They are gloriously beautiful or awfully terrible, according to the times and seasons in which they are beheld. When viewed in the broad glare of day, they seem like large lakes, gently undulating in the breeze, and their variegated flowers flash in the sun, like phosphorescent sparkles on the surface of the waters. Seen by moonlight, they appear calm and placid as the lagunes of Venice, and the beholder almost wonders why they do not reflect back the starry glories of the sky above them. In storms, the clouds that hang over them seem, in other places, and the lightning sweeps closely to their surface, as if to mow them with a fiery scythe, while as the blast blows through them, the tall grass bends and surges before it, and gives forth a shrill whistling sound, as if every fibre were a harp-string of Æolus. In the spring, they put forth their rich verdure, embossed with the early wild flowers of many hues, spreading a gorgeous carpeting, which no Turkish fabric can equal. At this season, in the early dawn, while the mists hang upon their borders—curling in folds like curtains through which the morning sheds a softened light, "half revealed, half concealed," by the vapory shadows that float fitfully over the scene—they appear now light, new shaded, and present a panorama ever varying, brightening and darkening, until the mists roll up, and the uncurtained sun reveals himself in his full rising.

"To come more near the earth than is their wont,"

In the summer, the long grass stoops and swells with every breath of the breeze, like the waves of the heaving ocean, and the bright blossoms seem to dance and laugh in the sunshine, as they toss their gaudy heads to the rustling music of the passing wind. The prairies are, however, most beautiful, when the first tints of autumn are upon them; when their lovely flowers, in ten thousand varieties, are decked in their gorgeous foliage; when the gold and purple blossoms are contrasted with the emerald-green surface and silver linings of their rich leaves, and all the hues of the iris, in every modification, throw themselves on all sides, to dazzle, bewilder, and amaze. Bleak, desolate, and lonely as a Siberian waste, the prairie exhibits itself in winter pathless and trackless, one vast expanse of snow seemingly spread out to infinity, like the winding sheet of a world.

The traveler of the "Rocky Mountains" may rise with the early morning from the centre of one of the great prairies, and pursue his solitary journey until the setting of the sun, and yet not reach its confines, which recede into the dim, distant horizon, that seems its only boundary. He however, will hear the busy hum of the bee, and mark the myriads of parti-colored butterflies, and other insects that flirt around him; he will behold tens of thousands of buffalo, grazing in the distance, and the savage, but now peaceful Indian, intent upon the hunt; and he will see troops of wild horses speeding over the plain; shaking the earth with their unshod hoofs, tossing their free manes like streamers to the wind, and snorting fiercely with unbridled nostrils; the fleet deer will bow and [illegible] by him; the wolf will [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] at him; and the little prairie dog will rise to the top of his [illegible] mound and bark at him, before he retreats to its den within it. No human being may be the companion of the traveler in the immense solitude, yet will he feel that he is not alone—the wide expanse is populous with myriads of creatures, and in the emphatic language of the red man, "The Great Spirit is on the Prairie."

REASON AND INSTINCT.

BY REV. T. H. GALLAUDET.

Robert had been very anxious to learn whether animals think; and when he was told that they act from instinct, while men and children reason, he came to his mother and the following conversation occurred.

R. Mother, I do not understand exactly what reason is. Will you please to explain it to me?

M. It would take me a long while, Robert, to tell you all about it, but I will tell you enough to show you how very different reason is from instinct.

If something is coming very suddenly towards your eyes, you shut them; but you do not think that you will do this, or why you will do it. You do it from instinct, or, as we say, instinctively.

I have read a story of a lady who was one day walking alone in a country where tigers live. One of these terrible animals suddenly appeared and began to approach her. What could she do to defend herself? In an instant she thought of one thing that might possibly drive the tiger away. She had a parasol in her hand. She opened it suddenly towards the tiger, and he was so frightened by it, that he immediately turned about and ran off into the woods.

The lady perceived the great danger she was in; she thought how she might prevent the tiger from attacking her; she thought opening the parasol suddenly towards him might do this; and she opened the parasol for this very purpose.

In doing this she reasoned. She had seen little children, perhaps, or some kinds of animals startled, by having something come very suddenly towards them. She might have been alarmed herself, some time or other, in this way. She recollected it, and thought that in the same way the tiger might be alarmed by the opening of her parasol.

It was reason, and not instinct, that led her to act so wisely.

The caterpillar throws off its old skin exactly at the right time; not because it thinks that it will have a new and better one, or that it must do this several times, that, at last it may be prepared to hang from the silk button, and become a chrysalis, and afterwards a beautiful butterfly. It knows nothing about these wonderful changes. How can it? It never passed through them before, or saw any other caterpillar pass through them; nor has it ever been taught about them by other insects. What the caterpillar does, it does without thinking of the different ways in which it must act, or of the purpose for which it must act. It acts entirely from instinct.

When your uncle John takes off his thick woollen coat in the spring, (as the weather begins to be quite warm,) and lays it away in his trunk, and puts on a thinner one,—he does this, not from instinct, but from reason.

He has learned, from having done so before, that it is best for his comfort and health; he thinks that the cold weather is passed, and that the summer is coming on, and that he shall not need his thick, warm coat again till the autumn, unless it may be, now and then, on a cool day. What he does, he does on purpose, and can tell you why he does it. He does it from reason.

Instinct is that something which God gives to animals, so that it is as much a part of them as their life is, which directs them to do certain things to preserve their lives, and to take care of themselves, and of their young, and to continue their different kinds, year after year;—and to do all this, certainly and regularly, without having been taught it,—and with as much skill the first time, as the second, third, fourth, or at any time afterwards,—and without thinking why it is done.

Reason is also the gift of God. It is his peculiar gift to man. It is that which makes man so very different from beasts, birds, fishes and insects.

You see reason beginning to show itself in a very young child. How soon the child seems to learn both how, and why, to do certain things. It soon understands, also, how and why other persons do certain things. It early shows design in what it does, and sometimes considerable contrivance and skill.

When it learns to talk, how soon it begins to inquire how things are made, and why things are made; how things are done, and why they are done.

The child very early understands why it ought to do what is right, and not to do what is wrong; and how it ought to conduct towards its parents; and do to others as it would have others to do to it. It continues to improve, and understands how and why it must believe that there is a God, who made all beings and things; and how, and why, it must love, obey, and serve him, that its soul may be prepared, after its body is dead, to go to heaven, and be holy and happy there for ever. It is reason that enables the child to do all this.

But if I should go on to tell you all the things which reason enables children and men to do, I might spend years in telling you.

Whenever we think how any thing was made, or why it was [illegible] so as to do right,—or not to conduct in a certain way, so as not to do wrong, we reason. Whenever we think how or why any thing will make us and others more wise, or good, or happy,—or less so,—we reason.

And, because our minds, or souls, are able to do all this, we say they have reason, and that reason enables them to do it.

R. Mother, how glad I am that I have reason.

M. That you may well be, my son.—When you see the little birds and insects doing many curious things, the wonderful instincts which direct them to do these things, show you there is a God. But how much more striking is the proof that there is a God, when you see children and grown people doing those things which are so far, far above instinct, and which reason alone enables them to do.

How did man get this wonderful power of his soul? Whence came his soul itself? How came it to be united to his body?

You have seen how our bodies alone, from the design, contrivance, and skill with which they are made, and their different parts put together, and kept in order, prove that there is a God. How much more, then, do our souls prove this; with powers superior to those of the body; with reason so superior to the instincts of the brutes; with reason, the peculiar gift of God to man, and which makes man somewhat like God.

How thankful, my son, should you be to God, for giving you reason. And how careful should you be so to use your reason, that you may continue to improve in knowledge and goodness,—that you may become more and more like God, and thus be prepared to know more of him in heaven, and to be happy in loving and serving him for ever.

HAIR! HAIR!

BALDNESS.—Important Discovery—the Great Mystery found out at last.

DR. STERRY'S HAIR REGENERATOR.—Dr. Sterry, after much attention to the important subject of preserving the hair, has after many experiments chemical and physical, been able to discover an article which is now offered with the greatest confidence for the toilet, as the best thing ever discovered, its softening and penetrating quality, to produce a good head of hair—to prevent it from falling off when baldness is apprehended—to restore it when baldness has taken place, and to prevent it from turning gray. It is more nourishing than pomatum, antique oil, or Cologne water. It is a beautiful article for ladies' curls—it makes the hair soft and lively, and produces uncommon brilliancy. Thousands have tested its superior virtues and excellence, and in every instance it stands unrivalled. It is an infallible cure in all affections of the skin on the head—as dandruff, &c. &c. Every family should be supplied with a bottle of this oil, that by its application to the head and hair of children, the beautiful and ornamental appendage of a fine head of hair, which nature has supplied us may be preserved.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and use administered to more than 18 000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.
THE TEETH! THE TEETH!
The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

INFIDELITY VERSUS CHRISTIANITY.

"In concluding this comparison of the religious influences hostile to the ancient and modern church, it is necessary to notice the opposition of infidelity and erroneous forms of Christian doctrine. In the first ages of Christianity, the great conflict was with Paganism. A system which denied the truth of Christianity, of Paganism, and of Judaism, which, while it trod upon the Bible, laughed at the rites of the Pantheon, existed indeed; but it was an isoteric doctrine, hidden within the groves of the philosopher and the cloister of the priest. That bold and shameless infidelity, which since the reformation has struggled so fiercely to sweep Christianity from the earth, had not yet appeared. It was the offspring of a later age. The mental agitations, the amazing intellectual activity, to which the efforts of the reformers in leaving off the superstitions of Rome had given birth, in connection with the frightful licentiousness engendered by the operation for centuries of a corrupt religion, quickened into life, and gave character and force to the delusion of modern infidelity. The influence of the Reformation, in awakening the intellect, extended far beyond the counteracting influence of its doctrines. The public mind was every where aroused by the exciting nature of the contest. The old channels of thought were forsaken, the old landmarks of doctrine swept away, and the great deep was broken up. Nor is it a matter of surprise, that in countries where the truths of the Reformation were not suffered to root themselves, or where they could grow only in the hot-house of state patronage, infidelity should have reached up to so lofty a height.

With this fierce, proud and malignant opponent, Christianity has been obliged to grapple in circumstances, than which none could be more favorable to the total rout of all her forces. Against her were arrayed the highest powers of wit and science.—Heaven suffered minds of the first order to waste their energies in the support of this negation of truth. There is scarcely a single department of intellectual labor, in which infidelity has not had distinguished advocates. It has gone down into the subterranean depths of metaphysics, and labored with the energy of a Hume to upheave the foundations of human belief. It has traversed the sunny fields of literature, and breathed its poison on the page of history.—It has ascended the rostrum of the statesman, and in the costume of liberty has employed the force of eloquence to subvert the noble truths of Christian freedom. It has [illegible] the high places of sacred literature, corrupting the fountains of religious influence, and prostituting the acquisitions of learning to the horrid work of debauching the teachers of men. It has even gone up into the pulpit and wielded the heavenly sympathies, attractions, and powers, of that sacred place, against the life of that religion which gave them existence. Not satisfied with this wide range of effort, it has descended into the styes of human corruption, and there, by ribaldry, by falsehood, by pandering to all the licentious desires of man, it has toiled with insane energy to shut the door of reformation upon the criminal, and extinguish forever the still glimmering spark of hope in the breast of the abandoned.

In concluding these wide spread operations it brought to its aid all the then present and well remembered corruption of a most degenerate Christianity. The infidel wielded the corruptions of the church against the very life of the church. The pride of the hierarchy, the licentiousness of the priesthood, the bigoted ignorance of churchmen, the blood of heroic martyrs, and the contemptible fooleries by which the multitude were deluded, which had defiled the history of the church for centuries, gave to a keen-sighted infidelity an immense advantage over its opponent. They boasted of its tendency to disenthrall the mind; it was about to introduce the jubilee of knowledge, refinement, liberty, and equality. The latter, wherever it turned, was met by the hideous form of that corruption which had preyed for ages upon the peace, morality, and liberties of men.—The tendencies of the former were not yet fully developed. It had not enjoyed space and opportunity for the manifestation of its character. The latter for a cycle of years, had been the dominant religion of Europe, and partially of Asia and Africa. Around the former clustered all the attractions of novelty, and large hope; around the latter, the damning persecutions, corruptions, hypocrisies, and failures of centuries. Under such circumstances the conflict began, and with such weapons it was carried forward.

For a time these vast efforts portended the ruin of the Christian cause. But it was only for a brief season. These hordes of the infidel ravaged, but they did not conquer; they passed over the land with fire and sword, but they aroused the ardor of Christian zeal. They taught the Christian the discipline of their arms. Momentary defeat became the means of the more complete and permanent triumph of the cross. A thousand intellects [illegible] their keen vision upon the evidences of Christianity. The fields of sacred [illegible] were [illegible] in every [illegible]

[illegible] Meanwhile the mask fell [illegible] this mockery of religion. It stood forth [illegible] in its naked ugliness before the world. Heaven suffered it to occupy a noble theatre on which to act out its true character in view of all coming time. From that scene of raging passion, wild uproar, legalized hate, lust and butchery, I need not draw the veil. The memory of that time fills the soul with horror. That scene inspired courage in the Christian, while it covered the face of the infidel with paleness.—His chosen vantage-ground was wrested from him. Where are now the boast, the jubilations, the pæans of triumph in anticipation of the speedy fall of Christianity, which then deafened the ear of heaven? Where is now that host of philosophers, wits, poets, historians, statesmen and crowned heads, which little more than half a century ago, licked the dust trodden by the feet of the strumpet goddess of infidelity? The song of triumph has ceased; the loud huzzas are hushed. The swellings of that wretched atheism, instead of engulfing, have borne the ark of Christian truth high on the solid earth. Doubtless this opponent will continue to resist the advance of the cross. We know not, indeed, but that he is even now summoning his energies for another fearful struggle. Nor is it improbable that with him, Christianity is destined to grapple most vigorously in the conflict which is to chain the prince of darkness and usher in the millennial morn. Yet she fights with an oft conquered foe; around her are the trophies of victory and the impreguable defenses of our faith. The church has reached a position which commands the entire field." — Rev. S. M. Fisher.

PURIFYING THE TEMPLE.

There is something very deeply interesting in that zeal for the honor of the Sanctuary, shown by the Saviour in excluding from the Temple those who were dishonering it by various worldly occupations. He was prepared to raise the hand of violence against him, had not an indignant rebuke been sufficient to have accomplished his purpose.

We can see no reason why every thing that now enters the Sanctuary, of a mere secular and worldly character, especially during the hallowed services of religion, is not equally offensive in his sight. If the money changers and those that sold doves, violated by their occupation, the sanctity of the Temple, do they not violate its sanctity who carry on various worldly transactions in their hearts in that holy place. They who suffer their thoughts to roam in every direction, regardless of the solemn themes brought [illegible] ship, as are real offenders against the spiritual properties of the Sanctuary, as those who bought and sold within its holy precinct.—The vain wanderings and idle traffickings of men's hearts in the place of divine worship, must have all the odiousness in the holy Saviour's eyes, that they had who openly made the Ancient Temple an house of merchandise. There is now greater illumination in the minds of men respecting divine things than when the former dispensation existed. And with augmented light there is augmented guilt in the non-conformity of men's minds to the sacred solemnities of divine worship.

Let him that treads heedlessly the courts of the Lord, or that dares to trifle there, or scruples not to give way to idle musings upon worldly business; let all such remember with what solemn earnestness the indignant Saviour rebuked the ancient traffickers in his holy Temple; and that as holy in his sight as ever, are the places where his honor dwells, and as odious all that lightly esteem them.—Boston Recorder.

Temptations peculiar to ministers.—The sacred calling of ministers does not secure them from temptations, but such is the corruption of their hearts, and of the world, that it exposes them to dangerous temptations. The devil scales us on the temple side, and often gets possession of our hearts. Ministers are often guilty of spiritless formality in managing holy things. In the composing of sermons, the mind is exercised about the matter, order and expressions, without holy affections suitable to divine things, and partly, because from custom, the most solemn concerns pass through the soul without serious regard and application; because the ministerial office obliged us to furnish ourselves with the knowledge of the admirable mysteries of godliness for the instruction of others, we are apt to make that the only end of our studies, like vintners that buy large quantities of wine for sale, and not for their use. There is not in many ministers, a spark of that heavenly fire which the reflective meditation on spiritual and eternal truths inspires into the soul, which our Savior came to kindle. Their knowledge is not lively and operative, but like a winter's sun that shines without vital heat. If they are enriched with rare talents, they are too apt to profane the holy ordinance of preaching, by secret aims and desires of vain glory; the temptation is the more dangerous, because esteem and praise for intellectual excellencies that are peculiar to man, and wherein the eminence of his nature consists, are very pleasing, even to those who are of unspotted conversation and free from cardinal pollutions.

Chrysostom confesses of himself, that when he preached to a thin auditory, his words died on his lips, and his spirit was [illegible] preacher. And many carried along by the current of their injudicious auditors, are curious to bespangle their discourses with light ornaments, to please the ear, and are not studious to preach Christ and him crucified, in a style distant from all shadow of vanity to save the soul.—Dr. Bates.

THE HOPE OF THE CHRISTIAN.

BY AGNES S. HUTCHINGS.

"Know that the Christian's hope sublime,
Transcends the bounds of space and time."

A celebrated writer has observed, that "hope is the chief blessing of man, and that hope only is rational, of which we are certain that it cannot deceive us." How then does the hope of the man of the world compare with that of the christian? The former is deluded on by his own desires, like the boy in the fable, who thought to find a golden cup at the foot of the rainbow, and after a flattering chase he perceives the brilliant colours, that lured him onward, vanishing in air, and he looks back on his toilsome path with sorrow and regret. But the hope of the latter rest upon a sure foundation; the promsie of Him whose word is immutable, and yet it is an "anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast." Let us observe the course of the christian. Do we see him urging his way forward—pressing through all opposing obstacles, allured by that ignis fatuus of a disordered mind, the hope of finding happiness in gain? Does he toil by day and night, bearing patiently anticipating the time when his genius shall be valued, and he shall win a name to be written on the scroll of fame? Does he expect to find among the paths of literature, or the rugged heights of science, an oasis for a tranquil resting place, "a well of living waters" whereby to refresh his weary and thirsting spirit? Do we see the christian, led on by the hope of earthly power, fathoming the winding of the human heart, searching it in all its depths and mysteries, till it becomes to his hand like a harp of certain sound, answering to his slightest touch, that he may influence and control the movements of others as by the spell of an enchanter? No, these are the hopes that operate with a talismanic power, on the hearts of those who live for this world only: the hope of the christian leads him to look beyond the vale of time. True he seeks for wealth, but it is for treasures in that world 'where gold becomes not [illegible] toils for a name, but it is a name to stand engraven on the archives of eternity. He explores the depth of learning and philosophy, that he may make the little knowledge he can acquire here, subservient to the great cause of truth, progresses, step by step, his eye is fixed on that world whose light shall burst in on the darkened mind, and knowledge shall be increased through unending ages. He searches the human heart not to make tools of mankind, but to apply a balm to the wound, to lead, to persuade the deceased to the fount of healing waters.

'The rich man's contumely, and the proud one's scorn,'

The hope of salvation resting upon the love of the Savior, rouses the christian to action. For this hope, he is willing to labor, and toil, and suffer; and fain hold up to others, the light that illumines his own norrow pathway; he extends to them the hand of affection,

"He tries each art, reproves each dull delay, Allures to brighter worlds, and leads the way."

Do earthly blessings cluster around him; is his home the abode of peace, of comfort, the treasured spot where are garnered up his heart's deep affections? How sweetly does this hope of heaven mingle in all his ways; and as his eye rests upon the little circle who, next to their Almighty friend, regard him as their cherished one, their all, his heart rises within him in gratitude and praise to his God, for he knows beyond the shadowy horizon of time, lies a still more perfect home, where changes are unknown, and where he and his beloved ones shall dwell forever at the feet of his Saviour. Does darkness shroud from him the sunlight of prosperity, and the cold winds of poverty and affliction beat upon his defenceless head, this blessed hope of immortal life, rises like an iris upon the cloud of adversity, cheering his heart and renewing his courage. And when he descends to the valley of death, and to his weary eye darkness seems brooding over the tomb, hope opens up a vista through the gathering shades, and he sees before him the gates of pearl, and the golden streets of New Jerusalem; and as his feet touch the shores of the glorious city, lo! the light that has so long led him onward is lost in the effulgence, and heavenly hope is swallowed up in full fruition.

Reader, have you this hope? If not, make no delay; strive for its blessed light, its purifying, holy influence. It will sustain and cheer you through life, and lead you at last to the haven of eternal rest.

AN INFIDEL SILENCED.

One very warm evening, about twenty years ago, passing the house where Thomas [illegible] the lower window was open [illegible]

[illegible] more mischief and bloodshed than any book ever printed—and was believed only by fools, and designing knaves, &c. Here he paused, and while he was replenishing his tumbler with his favorite brandy and water, a person, who I afterwards found was an intruder, like myself, asked Mr. Paine if ever he was in Scotland?—The answer was, yes.

So have I been, continues the speaker; and the Scotch are the greatest bigots with the Bible I ever met—it is their school book, their houses and their churches are furnished with Bibles, and if they travel but a few miles from home, their Bible is always their companion; yet, continues the speaker, in no country where I have travelled have I seen the people so comfortable and happy; their poor are not in such abject poverty as I have seen in other countries; by their bigoted custom of going to church on Sundays, they save the wages which they earn through the week, which in other countries that I have visited, is generally spent by mechanics and other young men in taverns and frolics on Sundays; and of all the foreigners who land on our shores none are so much sought after for servants, and to fill places where trust is reposed, as the Scotch: you rarely find them in taverns, the watch house, alms house, bridewell, or state prison. Now, says he if the Bible is so bad a book, those who use it most would be the worst of people—but the reverse is the case. This was a sort of argument Paine was not prepared to answer, and a historical fact which could not be denied—so without saying a word, he lifted a candle from the table, and walked up stairs; his disciples slipped out one by one, and left the speaker and myself to enjoy the scene.

Impressions in Prayer.—The occasion requires, perhaps, that a few words be offered, with regard to the general subject of impressions in prayer. While I dissent entirely from much that has been written in our own times, in reference to what has been called "the prayer of faith," as being not only unscriptural, but of dangerous tendency, I still believe that there is such a thing as communion with God in prayer; intimate communion, yes, heart-melting, heart-dissolving communion; such as the venerable Mather sometimes enjoyed, when he prostrated himself in secret before God, and wet his study floor with tears. I believe, too, that Christians, who abound in prayer, have sometimes such sensible assistance in their supplications for particular [illegible] cision, when they rise from the duty, that the things prayed for will be bestowed.—For they reason: "God would not have afforded me such special assistance, in praying for this or that event, if he had not intended to hear the prayer and grant the request." I see nothing enthusiastical or unreasonable in a conclusion such as this; though, to be sure, we are not infallible in judgments of this nature, more than in others, and they should be formed and followed with wisdom and caution.

I will go further, and say, in reference to this matter, that if holy, spiritual persons, while engaged in their devotions, should think that they received remarkable impressions from God, in regard to certain coming events, I would not ridicule them. I would not say that the thing was impossible. For I know 'there are more things in heaven and earth than some men have dreamed of in their philosophy." I know, too, that some of the best Christians that have ever lived, have pretended to receive such impressions, and the things of which they were in this way premonished, have often come to pass. Repeated instances of this kind are sufficiently attested, as having occurred in the life of Dr. Mather. At the same time, I should feel, that even the best Christians were exceedingly liable to be deceived in regard to impressions of this nature, and consequently that it became them to say little about them; and more especially, that they should not suffer their duties—their conduct—to be influenced by them.—Dr. Pond.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

Draw nigh to God.—God is every where. The soul that comes with hallowed affections, with strong aspirations for entire conformity to his law, will constantly enjoy his presence. Our Savior pronounced a blessing upon the pure in heart—"they shall see God." The more pure the heart, the nearer may it approach to God. When it is cleansed from all filthiness of the flesh, and of the spirit, its communion is constant, deep, glorious.

In the "night watches," when every other object is shut out, the soul turns to God and dwells in the sun-light of his countenance. It is never less alone than when in such nearness to God. It does not have to ask, 'My Father, art thou here?' for it seems as if the eye of God were resting upon it—as though there were not another being in the universe for that eye to look after. The Father is present with all the compassion of a God. The Holy Ghost is present, taking of the things of Christ, and showing them to us. The Son is present with all the deep love of an elder brother, soothing us gently to sleep in the arms of his love.

In the morning, we awake and find ourselves still with God. In all our slumbers, his unsleeping eye has watched over us. [illegible]

[illegible] and that when we enter by Him we are saved, and 'go in and out and find pasture.' It is the Holy Ghost still taking of the things of Christ to show unto us.

Through the day, the ear of God is open to our requests, and his hand full of blessings reached out to the needy soul. Jesus stands at his right hand, ready to present all our supplications, so that we never need plead in vain. In the name of Jesus, the soul not only reaches the ear, but the heart of God, and receives the richest blessings a God can bestow. God is every where.—"Draw nigh to Him, and He will draw nigh to you."

A Day River.—It is said that in Peru there is a river called the Diurnal, or day river; because it runs with a great current by day, but is wholly dry at night; which change is thought to be owing to the heat of the sun melting the snow that lies on the mountains, but when the sun goes down and the cold night approaches, the snow hardens, by which alone, the river is fed, and the channel is quite dried up.

Not much unlike this river, are all worldly contentments; which are only day comforts, but not night comforts. In the sunshine of peace and prosperity, they flow with some pleasing streams; but in the night season of affliction, they vanish and come to nothing.

It is far otherwise with the promises of the gospel, whose streams of comfort in the time of trouble, do usually run most plentifully, and refresh most powerfully the weary and afflicted soul; so as to preserve it from fainting under the pressure of any evil.

The less tenderness a man has in his nature, the more he requires from others.—Rahel.

MY PLAY-MATE'S FATHER.

I intend, in this little sketch, to give my readers an account of an affair that came under my own particular notice. It shows what intemperance will do, and then what temperance will do. How thankful should we be, whose parents are kind, sober, and industrious, and who provide for our every want and comfort. We have a warm bed to sleep in, clean warm clothes to wear, and plenty of food to eat, while so many [illegible] scarcely anything to cover their nakedness, or protect them from the chill winter's wind, except a few tattered rags.

A crust of mouldly bread, with perhaps a cold potatoe, is all they are able to obtain, to satisfy their gnawing hunger. A miserable hovel with a heap of shavings or straw in one corner for a bed, is all they have to protect them from cold and snow.

How miserable to think of, and all this caused by intemperance. How soon ought the monster to be driven from the land, which causes so much misery and want.

Some time last winter I was passing down a street in which one of my playmates lived. He was a smart, sprightly boy, and I was very fond of his company, choosing him for a companion at play, in preference to many others. He had generally been well clothed, but of late I had noticed that his garments were ragged and dirty, nothing but a brimless straw hat protected his head, and sometimes, even in the coldest weather, I had seen him abroad with bare feet. I enquired what was the cause of this, for it touched my heart. The answer was: "Father takes the money to buy rum." This was it. The father would see his children nearly freeze, and for all I know, starve, rather than go without rum. But I must go back and continue my story.

As I said, I was passing down the street, when I saw, just ahead of me, a man staggering along as though he had been partaking of the fatal poison. I quickened my pace to ascertain the truth, when I perceived my friend and another lad advancing from the opposite direction. They soon met the drunken man, when, to my surprise, they both began to make snow balls and throw at him. I called to them to stop, but they paid no attention to it, but began to throw harder than ever. I ran towards them, and on looking the man in the face, to my astonishment, I saw it was Henry's father. For a moment I could not utter a word, but when I could catch my breath, I asked him how he could be so cruel and wicked as to throw snow balls at his father! His answer was, "O, he licks me when he gets drunk, and I meant to give him a licking some time or other."

I led the poor, miserable man to his dwelling, which stood close by, and, with some difficulty, his poor wife managed to get him to lie on the bed.

Poor woman! I pitied her from the very bottom of my heart. I perceived the tears trickling down her care-worn cheeks, when she saw the wretched state her miserable husband was in. But not a groan; not even a word of complaint escaped her lips. But the livid hue of her countenance told, that she would ere long be laid in the cold grave, and I sighed to think how soon.

I looked around the cold and dreary apartment. There was no carpet on the floor, and, save a couple of old broken-backed chairs, a stool, and a shattered table, the room was destitute of furniture.

It was with a [illegible]

Some months had passed, and the husband was sinking deeper and deeper in his sin. The devoted wife was laid on a sick bed, from which there was no prospect of her ever rising alive. Intemperance had caused this also. Their prospects were thus getting worse and worse, when the Washington Temperance Reformers arrived here, and great success crowned their efforts. Drunkard after drunkard had signed the Pledge, but still M——— was inflexible. His appetite for rum was so strong that he wouldn't "sign away his liberty" to drink it. The efforts of his friends, however, were at last successful, and they prevailed on him to affix his name to the Pledge.

A month or so more had passed, when I paid my young playmate a visit; he confessed himself sorry for what he had done to his father, and begged I would forgive him, which I readily did. The house presented a very different appearance, from what it did on my former visit. The floor was carpeted. Plain, but neat furniture stood in its place, and there was a pleasing air of comfort around the whole apartment. The wife was gradually regaining her health, for her husband was now kind and affectionate to her and their children.—Plenty filled their cupboard, and the children were clothed neatly and warmly.

I staid till evening, when the husband came in. On seeing me, he took me by the hand and shook it warmly. His eyes were now bright, and his cheek had the look of health, instead of the pallid face and bloodshot eye.

He informed me that he had plenty of work, and was doing well. The money that he had spent for rum he was now laying up. He was contented and happy.—Temperance had done this! C.

THE GOOD MAN, AND HIS GOOD SON.

Related chiefly in short words.

Abraham was called the "friend of God." You may know from this that he was very good. God told him that those who should be born to him, would grow to a great nation. Yet he was ten times ten years old, ere his wife had a child. Still he trusted God's word. How glad he must have been, when that dear son of his old age was born.

He named him Isaac, which means laughter. He made a feast on the day when his boy was weaned. He looked on him with joy as he grew up. At length he [illegible] his tent. He did not fail first to thank Him who had lent him a son. All was still on the wide plains where the large flocks of sheep had that day been heard to bleat. The young men who kept them, slept in their tents. In the midst of the night, Abraham heard a voice call his name. It was the Lord's. He started up, and said:—"Here am I."

The Lord then said:—"Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest." You may be sure the father paid great heed to hear all that should be said about his son. How sad he must have been, when the Lord told him to carry that son far off, and put him to death, for a burnt offering!

He knew it was the Lord who spoke, and that all he did was right. So he said not a word. Nor did he wait long, and so put off the hard task. He rose when the first faint streak of light was seen at the top of the hills in the east. He was soon on his way, with Isaac and two young men. For two sad days, they passed on, and yet the place was not in sight. The third day dawned, and as they went on, they rose to the top of a hill. There Abraham could see the mount to which he had been told to go.

"Stay here," said he to the young men, "while I and the lad go yonder and worship, and come again to you."

Isaac bore the wood by the side of his father, who went on with fire and a knife. He had often seen lambs killed and burnt, to show that God had a right to all things. But now he thought it strange that no lamb was brought with them.

And he spake and said:—"My father."

And he said:—"Here am I, my son."

And Isaac said:—"Here is the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?"

The tears must have come in the old man's eyes as he thought that his dear son was to be the lamb, and that he must see him die that very day.

"God will provide himself a lamb," said he, though he was almost choked with grief.

Isaac said no more. Like a good son, he trusted his father's word, which had never been false to him. But he thought these words meant a strange thing, when his father bound him and laid him on the pile of wood. He did not try to get away, for his father told him that the Lord had said he must do so. Now, just as the knife was aimed at him, an angel stopped his father's hand. "Now I know thou fearest God," said he, "since thou hast not held back thine only son from me."

God then promised still greater blessings to Abraham, who gladly unbound his son, and went home happy, for he had done just as God told him. If you would be happy, obey God as he did, and obey your parents like his good son.

In the morning, think what thou hast to do, and at night ask thyself what thou hast done.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

Correction.

We learn that there is a report in circulation in some parts of the S. D. Baptist connection, that 'the Seventh-day Baptist Register is not owned by a Seventh-day Baptist.' The report is entirely without foundation, originating with whom it may, as the Register office has never been owned or controlled otherwise. It is—has been—and will continue to be, under the controll of one or more "SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS." It is devoted to the interests of our denomination, and is their only organ. It is "OWNED," edited and published as it professes to be.—We cannot conceive of any shadow of reason for the report unless some of our 'good friends' think we have departed from the "Faith." When we do this, we trust some lover of the truths that distinguish the denomination will rise in "his majesty" against us and furnish the churches with a paper that will advocate their sentiments.—Until then, we hope to receive the undivided patronage of the denomination. And our brethren may rest assured that we shall spare no pains to serve them as we may be able, and we hope satisfactorily. In the mean time we trust that our 'friend,' with whom the report originated that has been so industriously circulated, will possess sufficient magnanimity to make this correction as extensive as the report.

New Subscribers.

Many thanks are due to several of our Agents for the handsome additions made to our subscription list. It encourages us not a little to find them so warmly engaged for the "Register." It will suit us as well to print 1,500 or more as 1,200.

Papers Returned.

We occasionally have papers returned to this office that are refused by those to whom they are sent. It is impossible for us to know who returns them in many cases unless the name of the subscriber and the P. O. from which they are returned are written on them. In all cases where this is not done we shall continue to send, and charge for them. If any one does not want the paper, let him give notice to the Postmaster, not forgetting to pay up what is due, and have him write to us that he wishes the paper discontinued.

Returned Packages.

We have had one or two packages of papers returned to this office for re-mailing, very much soiled. We hope the like may not occur again, as we shall take great pains in doing up our packages. The winter has been unusually unfavorable for the transportation of mails. We hope to furnish subscribers regularly and in season after this.

Explanation.

An Agent inquires if we meant our proposition, under the head of 'Agents Wanted,' to apply to present subscribers. We meant it only for new subscribers, and offered the per centage as an inducement to Agents and others to increase our subscription list.—Our present list is sufficient, could we receive pay according to the Terms, to sustain the paper. If our list increases we can afford it less.

"Ye must be Born Again."

Eternal salvation is secured only by the new birth. Men by nature are dead in trespasses and sins. There is no fear of God before their eyes, and the way of peace they know not. Their nature and feelings, with their habits, are opposed to holiness and to God. Their conduct is as their nature unholy, and tends to the destruction of soul and body. Being thus they are unfitted for the bliss of Heaven, and if admitted there could in no wise enjoy it. They must be born again. Every system of religion that teaches that men may live after the flesh and enjoy the fruits of the spirit, is but a snare laid to decoy souls to death. He who teaches that religion is vain or that its duties are non-essential to salvation, speaks of what he knows not. He who denies the doctrine of future rewards and punishments and the endless misery of the wicked, speaks of what he fain would wish were true, but which he can neither reconcile with his own sense of right or justice of God. The thousand refuges of lies that have been sought by men to quiet an admonishing conscience, will serve as so many weights to sink them lower in despair, where they shall read in the countenance of the Judge at the last day "Ye must be born again." All hopes of Heaven, founded on aught but that grace that changes the heart and creates a love for holiness and hatred to sin, are vain. All religion that does not restrain from sin and prompt to virtue and purity, is also vain.—And

"Vain are the hopes the sons of men,
On their own works have built."

Mortification, no labor, no acts of benevolence, no external purity, no well ordered life, nor any thing else is sufficient to save the soul that has not been born again.

Who has the evidence of a change of heart? Not he who talks most of his goodness, or makes long prayers, or wears a saintly garb. Not he who "with one hand puts a penny in the urn of poverty and with the other takes a shilling out." Not he who bestows large sums for benevolent objects, that his name may be in every one's mouth. Not they who have the form but not the spirit of godliness. Not they whom men count great or good, without other and better characteristics. The child of God is born of God, partakes of his spirit, loves his gospel, obeys his commands, walks in the truth, cherishes it in his heart, and bears the fruit of holiness in his life. The earth is not his home, and has not his affections. It contains not his treasure, nor possesses his heart. The seeds of holiness are sown in his heart, and are springing up in devout aspirations after God, and in an unsatisfying desire to be free from sin. This being the nature of him who is born again, he loathes sin, hates covetousness, despises iniquity, and never gives countenance to the base, unmanly and time-serving, craven spirit of this world.

A profession of religion is of itself no evidence of being born again. To bear the christian name and love the christian character, are by no means synonymous. The cunning of men and craftiness of the devil have brought forth innumerable systems of religion, bearing in some minor points a few faint characteristics of that religion that is pure and undefiled before God, yet destitute of the saving doctrine of the new birth.—To profess such a religion, requires no great effort. To live according to it, requires no self-denial, no love to God, and no obedience to his will. The drunken, the profane, the licentious, the cheat, the deceivers and robbers of men, and the pests of society cloak themselves with such a religion that while they pursue their sinful course they may ward off the force of truth, silence the reproofs of reproving conscience, and the monitions of the Holy Spirit. Such religion is vain. It neither changes the heart, or bears the fruit of holiness. It robs God of his glory, and men of their souls.

All religion is vain that does not secure the life of the spirit and obedience to God.—If a man is born of God, he will bear the fruits of the spirit; and "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law."

Saving Ordinances.

"Oh, it is not a saving ordinance; I don't think it essential to salvation. I hope I shall be saved if I don't do this, or that, or the other. Faith and repentance are the only saving ordinances." This kind of infidelity frequently answers to lull the conscience to sleep, and to close the eyes to the institutions of Christ's kingdom. This language of thousands, taken as it is, is a most glaring presumption on the mercy of God. Can any one suppose that God would institute ordinances, and give commands which men may neglect with impunity? Is the sum of religion couched in faith and repentance abstractly? With equal propriety may the subject be reversed, and any other two requirements of God be declared the only saving ordinances. It is true that faith and repentance are prominent in the conditions of salvation; but it does not follow from this that nothing else is required.—We are no where taught in the Bible, that it is sufficient for a man that he by faith and repentance is brought into God's kingdom, and after this he has nothing to do. For what purpose has God instituted Baptism, the Lord's Supper, the Sabbath? Why does he require humility, obedience, benevolence, &c.? And why does the Savior require his followers to be meek, pure in heart, and to exercise every feeling and principle characteristic of the gospel? Is a man at liberty to select any part of God's law, and say that it is not essential? or any of the characteristics of the gospel, and declare them not saving ordinances? Shall he who says that Baptism is a saving ordinance, say that the Sabbath is not? Who shall draw the line of "saving ordinances" but GOD? If God gives them, shall men disobey? Men should be careful how they deal with God. His word stands firmer than the pillars of Heaven. Every thing he has commanded men to do is essential to their salvation. It is as well to refuse faith and repentance, as to refuse Baptism, or the Sabbath, or any thing else that God requires. Either would be a contempt offered to God and a declaration of hostility to his government. A refusal of obedience to any of his commands, is a refusal of God and salvation. And faith and repentance cannot save the soul that is determinedly disobedient. Hence, one and all of the requirements of God are saving ordinances, since the soul cannot be saved that refuses obedience to either of them.

The Caledonia.

Great anxiety prevails as to the safety of the Caledonia.

Revival.

There has been a revival in Adams in which numbers have been converted. The work commenced in a series of evening meetings held by Rev. E. S. Bailey. Thirteen have been added to the church, and several others give evidence of having passed from death unto life. The Methodists have also held a meeting in the same vicinity, which resulted in the conversion of some souls.

Extract of a Letter from Eld. N. V. Hull.

"I rejoice to tell you that God has been pleased of late to revive his work amongst us; and especially to call up the minds of our neighbors to the subject of the Sabbath, and a number have resolved to "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." The Tracts of Mr. Chadwick, and also, Tract No. 2, have been sought with avidity and read with profit.

"It has pleased my Heavenly Father to afflict me with sickness for a number of weeks past. At the present my health is somewhat improved."

Temperance House.

With a great degree of pleasure we can announce to our citizens, and to the traveling community in general, that MARTIN SPEAR, ESQ., of this village, has cleared his Bar of all intoxicating drinks, and is now keeping a public house on temperance principles. This is the more gratifying to us, as he keeps our village Post-Office, and by this arrangement our citizens will be relieved of a very serious inconvenience under which they have formerly labored in transacting business at the Post-Office. We are confident that Mr. Spear will be amply sustained in his new arrangement.

For the Register.

LOOK AT THIS.

"There is peculiar strength in the tie of honor that now publicly binds us."—HON. THOMAS F. MARSHALL.

Look at this all who say, 'it is of no use for me to sign the pledge—I can abstain from the use of intoxicating beverages just as well without signing as with.' See what MARSHALL says about this:—"There is PECULIAR strength in the tie of honor that now PUBLICLY binds us."

A NEW SCHOOL TEMPERANCE MAN.

Public Worship, No. IV.

Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is.—BIBLE.

3. A STATED MINISTRY.—The stated ministrations of God's word in the sanctuary, I conceive to be one of the most well-adapted means of sustaining Public Worship, of which we can form any just conception. If a Religious Society, or a Church, whatever may be their pretensions to godliness, and a care for souls that are perishing for the truths of the Gospel, neglect to supply the pulpits of their houses of worship with ministers of the gospel, the blood of souls, I fear, will be found on their garments. It is a duty of no small import, and one which involves far-reaching and important results. And my mind has been keenly thrilled with the consequences of such a failure, on the part of God's people, while I have witnessed the effects in one religious community where I have been somewhat conversant for years. A few short years ago and we might have seen that beautiful edifice erected and dedicated to the worship of God comfortably filled with attentive worshipers. Alas! where are they now? Some have passed the bourne whence no traveler returns;—others have sought a home in western wilds; but still, a far greater number may be found at home! And what has caused the change? Are they under less obligation to worship God now than they were ten years ago? Are not their duties clustering around them on every side, and pressing them, by every consideration dear to the interests of religion, to the service of God in His courts? Truly, they are not absolved from duty. But, I can trace the cause of this fearful neglect, in some prominent degree, to the want of a stated ministry. The Church, the Religious Society, are verily guilty before God in this matter, and unless they arouse from their lethargy, and procure an efficient and attractive minister, their beautiful edifice will soon become a fit habitation for owls, being left destitute both of Preachers and hearers.—It is an awful feature in the character of that society. And, in fact, one year ago, and another house of worship in that same community became so much forsaken that it was deemed advisable to purchase an ORGAN for the purpose of exciting an interest in the attendance on church, which had the desired effect, in a great degree. Such is the state of morals in that community, that more than ordinary means are necessary to secure the attention of the people to things of paramount importance—the worship of God in the sanctuary.

Now, Mr. Editor, in view of these facts, I would urge the importance of a regular and stated ministration of God's word in the Sabbath, as an item in correcting public morals, and bringing the people up to the house of worship. I speak not against Conference and Prayer meetings, or any thing of the kind; but I do say, if we desire the worship of God to be sustained in the sanctuary, let us have PREACHING at least once on the Sabbath, and soon we shall witness the glorious results. It is this that will call out the ungodly; it is this that will enchant the slothful professor from his lurking places on the Sabbath, and bring him under the influences of the gospel. It is this, in short, that will cause religion to flourish, though surrounded by the unhallowed influences of Infidelity. Witness ye not with what exactness the different classes of opposing sects herald forth their doctrines from the pulpit? And shall not those who acknowledge a "thus saith the Lord" for their practices and profession, be equally solicitous for the common cause of christianity and the welfare of Zion? A great, a fearful responsibility rests upon the Church of God in sustaining public worship. Nor are they alone,—the whole religious community in general—and each Religious Society in particular—have interests involved in the matter.

4. THE GREAT NUMBER WHO NEGLECT WORSHIP.—Upon a careful examination, I have been brought to the conclusion that less than one-third of the whole population of the United States attend public worship! I have assumed two cities as a very fair specimen on which I would base my conclusions. The city of Boston in New England, the land of steady habits, and the city of Cincinnati, in Ohio, are so situated that they will form a favorable basis from which to draw conclusions.

The population of Boston is 84,000.

All others, including Unitarian, Universalist, Catholic, &c.,		4,600
Total of all denominations, or 1 in 6 of the population.		14,150
Total of all Evangelical denom. or only 1 in 9 of the population!		9,550

Estimated attendance on Public Worship.

Episcopalians,		3,000
Unitarians,		9,500
Universalists,		3,200
All others, including Catholics,		10,500
Total of all denominations,		46,700
Total of the four leading Evangelical denominations,		23,500
Total of all others,		23,200

or, making all possible allowances, the result may be set down thus:

Total of population,		84,000
Total attendance on public worship of the four leading Evangelical denom.	25,000
Total attend. of all others,	24,000
Total attendance of all denominations,		49,000
Total therefore of habitual neglecters of public worship,		35,000

This is the result in round numbers, says the "Memorial."

"That it is substantially correct is certain. It was obtained as the result of an actual count of the congregations on the Sabbath, and can be verified in several ways. From it, it appears that a little more than one-half of the actual attendance on public worship in the city is in Evangelical churches. At the same time, it appears that this attendance is less than one-third of the whole population, and 10,000 less than the number of those who neglect public worship altogether!"

The population of Cincinnati is 50,000 "and there are, every Sabbath probably three thousand transient persons among us, who should attend church. There are now twenty-six evangelical churches, with about twelve thousand persons to a greater or less degree under their influence, and with seats in their houses for perhaps two thousand more. There are more than seven thousand children and youth who should be in the Bible class and Sabbath school; and yet less than three thousand are enjoying the benefits of this invaluable institution. There are in the city three thousand more males than females; many of whom are young men; and yet two-thirds of the attendants on public worship are females; and our young men are growing up and becoming the prey of infidelity, error and vice, and none seem to "care for their souls."

"The inroads of error and delusion among us are alarming. There are thirteen societies, professedly religious, who, if our views of the Gospel are correct, are under the power of errors and heresies that ruin the soul, with about eight thousand persons in attendance on their meetings. Of these, the Roman Catholics have more persons attending their services than can be seated in their houses of worship. This denomination is now erecting two very large church edifices; and unless Protestants bestir themselves, they will soon offer to the inhabitants of the city, more extensive, convenient and attractive places of worship, than any other society of professing Christians.

"There are in the city upwards of twenty-five thousand persons committed to no denomination whatever, who never enter the house of God, and who, if they were moved on by the Spirit, and should turn to seek the way of life, could find no churches in which they might attend the instructions of the Gospel. Several thousands of these are Protestant foreigners; for whom, with a single exception, no care has been exercised to bring them under evangelical influences."

Now, then, from the above data, we, who neglect to use all laudable means to sustain the worship of God in the sanctuary, may learn something of the duty we owe to God and to our fellow-men in this particular. Look at our own State—NEW-YORK,—famed for her intelligence and morality. In her population of 2,400,000, we have about 800,000 who neglect the public worship of God in the sanctuary. What a commentary upon the morals of New-York! And in the population of the United States, amounting to 17 million, we have five and a half million who neglect the stated means of grace in God's house.

But I shall weary your readers with a "long yarn," for which they will not thank me, and I close the series of articles by remarking,

5. THE AWFUL RESPONSIBILITY.—There is, no doubt, a responsibility assumed by all who neglect to worship God according to his revealed will. Not to worship God, is offering an insult to Deity which will eventuate in thrilling results. It is no less than dethroning the Almighty, and denying His right to reign over us. It is an indignity which will be treasured up by an Almighty hand, and at the last fearful day be opened to our view. Then, who, in view of all the consequences attendant on a neglect of public worship, will dare assume the responsibility of absenting himself from the sanctuary on all proper occasions?

Washington, March 7.

Retrenchment in the House Expenses.

The various resolves reported by the Committee on this subject, have occupied more than half the time for the past week. The reforms have been, cutting off the allowance of stationery to reporters, (for which they will please to receive my thanks, for their pure zeal for their country,) reducing their own allowance of stationery to $25 worth for the long session, and $20 worth for the short session—the amount of which has sometimes been $300 to each member; a reduction of the pay of a part of the messengers, pages, and laborers, in the employ of the House, about 20 per cent.; the limitation of the amount of stationery for the rest of the session, to $15 worth to each member; the abolition of the office draughtsman, and of one or two messengers. Then there were vain efforts to dispense with sundry other offices. In a debate on the expenses of the Folding Room, it was stated by a Whig, that 700,000 Loco Foco speeches and documents were sent from that room in a single session! A Democrat replied that more than 3,000,000 of Whig documents were sent from that same room during the recess of 1840, by the Whig Central Committee of nine. These reminiscences of past flagrant abuses, made a general laugh, and a resolve to apply a correction was adopted. An attempt to cut off another abuse, the furnishing of trunks and tin cases, for members to carry home books and maps, did not succeed! That many of the little items of retrenchment made by these resolves were called for, no one could doubt. It is hoped the members will go on to cut down their own mileage and pay, in proportion. A large number of private bills, chiefly previous acts, were passed on Friday. A veto to change the hour of meeting to 11, was passed on Wednesday by an immense majority, but by Saturday the members repented, and postponed it till April 1st. Early rising is not deemed healthy here! This is the sum total of the doings of the House. The nation must decide whether the music is worth the money! Turn to the Senate.

Tariff Debate.—Clay, Wright, and Smith. Mr. Clay occupied the most of Tuesday in developing his views of Tariff, and public economy, before a brilliant audience, crowding every cranny of the Senate chamber. He declared himself utterly hostile to any attempt to revive the protective system, and in favor of an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent., in order to raise a revenue of twenty-six millions, without repealing the land distribution bill. In any urgent case, where the representatives of a State, without distinction of party, called for a higher rate of duty to protect a particular interest, he should not object to it, though he would not urge it. Both he and Mr. Smith, of Ind., had much to say of the bearing of the India Cotton question upon the cotton growing States of this country, and the necessity of a tariff for their protection. The subject excites more and more feeling all over the South, and a great State Convention is soon to assemble in Alabama to consider it.

Mr. Wright made a very caustic reply to Clay, full of information of a practical character. His main position was, that no increase of the tariff was needed, if the proceeds of the land sales were restored to the Treasury, and proper economy observed in the various branches of the public service. He was for reducing the expenses of the Government to $20,000,000. Mr. Smith's speech was able, but presented nothing of special interest, save his elaborate discussion of the prospects of the cotton trade, and the growth of India cotton.

The subject will be resumed to-morrow.

News of the Day.

A young man who was in confinement in jail at Tallahassee, Florida, recently escaped through the assistance of his mother. She visited him in prison, and the two changed clothes, when he passed out clad in his mother's habiliments, sobbing in deep grief as he went by the turnkey. The exchange of prisoners was not discovered, until the son was far away.

A very large, gay, and expensive ball was given at the Park Theatre, on Monday evening last, at which over 3,000 persons were present. It is to be repeated again. Some of the managers have been published as bankrupts.

Marvelous Escape.—A boy 7 years of age, and the son of Dr. Doe, of this village, on Tuesday last, by some accident fell into a well, the depth of which was 20 feet, and containing about 7 feet of water. We have it from the boys lips, that while in the well, he made repeated but ineffectual calls for help, till perceiving that no one came to his assistance he resolved to attempt to extricate himself. He accordingly drew himself up the well by placing his hands upon the stones, which were literally covered with ice, until he came to within a few feet of the top, when his hold gave way and was again precipitated to the bottom. This attempt he tells us he made the second and third time with no better success, falling each time to the bottom of the well. But not yet disheartened, he made the fourth attempt, and succeeded through some mysterious means in getting out and thus saving his life. We learn that, notwithstanding, he was so completely exhausted as to be obliged to make the greatest exertion to get home, which was but a short distance. He is doing well, and nothing fatal is likely to result from the accident.—Calais (Me.) Journal.

Another McLeod Affair.—The Lockport Balance of the 2d inst., says: "A man named Hogan was arrested and brought before Mr. Leonard, Police Justice of this village, yesterday, on the charge of participating in the burning of the Caroline. The examination was not concluded when our paper went to press."

The Rochester Post publishes the following extract of a private letter to a Canadian gentleman in that city: "John Sheridan Hogan, one of the Caroline invaders, about whom there can be no mistake, has been arrested, and will doubtless be committed to take his trial for the part he took in the Schlosser murders. I am told he is clerk to the Sheriff of Gore District, who was McNab's Lieut. Colonel, opposite Navy Island, and that he was formerly in McNab's law office, and acted as his Secretary while at Chippewa, in 1838.—He is a good looking, bold, manly little fellow—tory and game to the backbone."

Later information from Lockport states that the Justice refused to interfere; and that on Tuesday, after lying in jail all night, Hogan was taken, on a writ of habeas corpus, before Judge Ransom; but the result of the investigation was not ascertained at the latest accounts. If, as seems probable, the prima facie evidence against Hogan be strong, we have all the danger and excitement of the McLeod case to go over again, with the greater chance this time of having found the right man.

☞Since the above was in type, we learn that Hogan was examined and set at liberty, on the ground of a defect in the warrant for his arrest.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONGRESSIONAL TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

Friday, February 25, 1842.

The Society met at 7 o'clock, P. M., in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and was opened with a prayer by the Rev. Mr. Tuston.

An address was then delivered by the President, the Hon. George N. Briggs.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Williams, of Connecticut, seconded by the Rev. Mr. Marsh, of New York:

Resolved, That devout gratitude is due to Almighty God for his signal interposition in behalf of our nation, in delivering it in so great a measure from those ravages of intemperance which threatened to overwhelm and destroy it; and that it is incumbent on every philanthropist and patriot to give the temperance his approbation and support, that its valuable principles may prevail throughout the world.

Upon which resolution Mr. Marsh addressed the audience.

On motion of the Hon. Lewis Riggs, of New-York, seconded by Dr. Sewall, of Washington:

Resolved, That the effects of alcoholic drinks upon the physical constitution of man, as displayed in the derangement of his functions, in the enfeebling of his powers, in the creation of a predisposition to disease and death, and the transmission of the effects to his offspring, furnish arguments of total abstinence, which should be brought forward constantly and prominently for the consideration of the public.

Upon which resolution, Dr. S. made some pertinent and instructive remarks, illustrating the grounds taken in the resolution by reference to his painted delineations of the human stomach at different stages—from a state of perfect health to that of death by delirium tremens.

On motion of the Hon Millard Fillmore, of New York, it was then

Resolved, That the exhibition of the effects of alcoholic drinks upon the human stomach by means of drawings, is the commencement of a new effort, and imparts a fresh impulse to the cause of temperance, being admirably calculated to reform the drunkard, and confirm sober men in the practice of total abstinence.

Resolved, That the essay of Dr. Thomas Sewall, entitled "Pathology of Drunkenness," with plates of the human stomach, as published by E. C. Delavan, Esq., in the Enquirer, should be extensively circulated in this and other countries; and that the enlarged drawings of the drunkard's stomach exhibited at this meeting, should be possessed by all temperance societies, and be permanently exposed to view in all suitable places of public resort.

On motion of the Hon. Thomas W. Gilmer, of Virginia:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the young men of America, especially to all who purpose devoting themselves to the service of their country to abandon at all times, and on all occasions, in the hours of severe study, in professional labor, on festive occasions, and in political meetings, the [illegible] all in authority, to use their influence in all suitable ways, to banish this evil from the land.

Mr. B. addressed the meeting on the last resolution, and having concluded,

On motion of the Hon. J. R. Giddings, of Ohio, it was

Resolved, That as all intoxicating drinks are at variance with the laws of our physical and moral being, and justly come into condemnation as sources of intemperance, we feel it our duty to pledge ourselves to entire abstinence from them as a beverage, nor can any law of hospitality or fashion make it incumbent on us to provide them for others.

The Hon. Thomas F. Marshall, of Kentucky, then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the custom at public entertainments, or fashionable dining parties, among gentlemen and ladies, of pledging each other, and drinking healths in wine, is a serious obstacle to the advance of the temperance cause among those classes where it prevails, and has no foundation in the natural principles of good taste, true hospitality, or refined manners.

Opon which resolution Mr. M. addressed the audience. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

The Hon. Christopher Morgan, of New-York, then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the cause of temperance is deeply interesting to the female sex, and has so enlisted the spirit of love, patience, and fortitude, which eminently distinguish our fair countrywomen, that, under the benignant smiles of Divine Providence, we may reasonably anticipate its complete triumph.

Which resolution was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Hon. James Irwin, of Pennsylvania, seconded by Mr. J. N. W. Hawkins, of Baltimore,

Resolved, That we view with great pleasure and admiration, the impulse that has been given to the temperance reform by those who have had the moral strength to burst the chains which bound them, and the moral courage to go forth and give the weight of their experience to the cause, and that we hail with peculiar satisfaction these newly organized and powerful auxiliaries to the temperance enterprise.

The meeting was addressed in an eloquent and forcible manner by several gentlemen from Baltimore, Capt. Lane, Mr. Hawkins, and Mr. Mitchell.

It was ordered that the proceedings of the meeting be published in all the newspapers in the city of Washington, willing to admit them into their columns, under the direction of the Executive Committee.

The Society then adjourned.

It is understood that sketches of the different speeches made on the occasion, are in a course of preparation, and that in a few days they will be laid before the public.

J. M. HOWARD, Sec'y.

The Maryland and Virginia Slave Case.—The National Intelligencer of Thursday contains a fuller exposition of the important points decided in this case. The editors say:

"We are indebted to a learned member of the Bar for the following more particular statement of judgement of the Court, and also of the separate opinions of the judges, than we, from our own knowledge, were able to furnish:"

Case of Prigg against the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The points decided by a majority of the Court were—

1st. That the provision in the Costitution of the United States relative to fugitive slaves, executes itself so far as to authorize the owner or his agent to seize the fugitive in any State of the Union, as property; and that no State law is constitutional which interferes with such rights.

2d. That this provision also contemplates legislation by Congress, to make the delivery of a fugitive slave more effectual against all State or other interference.

3d. That Congress having legislated, such legislation is the supreme law of the land, excluding all State legislation upon the same subject; and with which legislation by Congress, no State can pass any law to qualify, impede, or control the remedy given by the act of Congress.

3th. The power of legislation by Congress is exclusive—and no state can carry into effect the Constitutional provision in regard to fugitive slaves, even though Congress had not legislated upon the subject.

5th. That the points thus decided are in no manner intended to interfere with the police power of the States to take up runaway slaves, and guard against their misconduct, or depredations.

The opinion was delivered by Justice Story.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Daniel concurred in the opinion that the Pennsylvania law was unconstitutional and void, and that no State could pass any law to impair or impede the right of owners of fugitive slaves, as conferred by the act of Congress; but they held that the States were competent to legislate with a view to effectuate the remedy given by the act of Congress.

Mr. Justice McLean also concurred as to the unconstitutionality of the act of the Pennsylvania Legislature. He was of opinion that Congress, in this particular case, had the right to confer the power [illegible] majority, and recapitulating the points decided, intimated an intention of filing his opinion at length.

The case was then brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States under the 25 section of the Judiciary act of 1789, and the provision of a special act of the Pennsylvania Legislature, being the result of a negotiation between Maryland and that Sate, conducted by J. Meredith Esq. as Commissioner of Maryland.

The case was argued by Messrs. Meredith and Nelson for the State of Maryland, and by Mr. Hambly and the Attorney General for that State.

A Painful Transition.—On Monday last the term of service of one of the convicts in the Auburn State Prison, named Phillip Crater came to an end. But before he had been suffered for a moment the breath of freedom in the open air, an officer was ready to take him again in custody. It seems that he was sent here four years ago, from Tioga county, having been found guilty of theft; and that during his term of service, he had told three of the other convicts, either by way of confession or of braggadocio, we know not which, but most likely the latter, that he had, while keeping a tavern about 12 years since, murdered a pedlar—that his body had first been deposited under his woodhouse, but was afterwards buried near the Susquehannah river, about six miles from Owego; and that the pedlar's waggon had been by him broken to pieces, and the iron worked up for him by a blacksmith in the vicinity. These circumstances were soon related by the convicts to the keeper, who thereupon took some pains to inquire into their truth.

On searching on the spot designated as the one on which the corpse had been buried, the shin bones of a man were found, the river having so far washed away the banks as to exhibit them about 15 inches below the surface, the feet bones were were washed away and gone; and on enquiring of the blacksmith, it was ascertained that he had, not far from the time designated, worked up old wagon iron for this individual. The corroboration being thus strong, the sheriff of that county was here, and a little after eight, on the morning of his release, he was moving out of the village in the Ithaca stage, towards the place of his former residence as a murderer!

The same being boasts (to the convicts) also of having "knocked over" a fellow in the Allegany Mountains and robbed him of $400, or $1400—says the "chap" said he had $3000 with him, but after killing him he found, one convict says $400, another says $1400. Crater at this time owns a large farm, which is worth from $8,000 to $10,000.—Auburn Journal.

The Cilley Duel.—The National Intelligencer of yesterday contains statements from Hon. Wm. J. Graves of Kentucky, Charles King, Esq. of this City, and Reverdy Johnson of Baltimore, respecting the deplorable duel in which Hon. Jonathan Cilley of Maine, fell by the hand of Mr. Graves, with especial reference to the alledged participation of Mr. Clay in the matter. Mr. Graves states positively that, when he showed to Mr. Clay a form of challenge which he had drawn to send to Mr. Cilley, Mr. Clay overruled it and drew a milder one, which was sent. Mr. Clay never gave up the hope that the quarrel would yet be adjusted without a meeting—was surprised and distressed when he learned that the parties had gone out to fight, conferred with others as to the best means of yet arresting the duel, and shed tears when Mr. Graves came home, the least fortunate survivor of that sad encounter. It is but justice to state that these gentlemen all aver that Mr. Wise also endeavored to avert the duel. Hon. H. A. Wise publishes in the Intelligencer a 'Statement' concerning the Cilley duel, in reply to the letter of Mr. Graves. He seeks to show that Mr. Clay was the one who insisted that Cilley should reduce what he had said to writing and that he approved of the rifle as the weapon to be used; and that Mr. Wise opposed both these proposals.—Tribune.

New York Lunatic Asylum.—The report of the Trustees of the State Lunatic Asylum, just printed, is a document of great research and value; embracing as it does an enlightened and comprehensive view of this subject, not only in this state alone, but in the whole Union. They state that the object of such institutions should be not the safe custody of the patient alone, but to employ means likely to restore to their places in society a portion of the afflicted, and to reconcile the remainder to their confinement. In this State the whole number of insane and idiots is 2,340, or one to each 1,038 persons; that the ratio according to the population being greater than in any of the States of Arkansas, Michigan, Wisconsin, with District of Columbia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana; there being in the latter State but one 3,524 inhabitants. In these States, however, the proportion is two whites to one colored. The greater proportion, in respect to population, is in Rhode Island, being one to every 503. Taking the Union together, one to 979.

In the city of New York it appears that there are 120 whites at public and 67 at private charge, also 5 colored at public and 9 at private charge, showing an increase over 1825, in the aggregate, of 34 only. The number of lunatic paupers in the county is 330, of which 305 are at Blackwell's Island.

In the Bloomingdale Asylum there were 189 patients during the year 1840; [illegible] of the present modes of treatment to those adopted formerly.—Cor. of J. of Com.

Another Mysterious Murder.—Horrible Developments?—Yesterday morning the city authorities received information that a murder had been committed in Boston, and the dead body of the person forwarded to this city by Harden's Express. On receipt of this information, steps were taken which led to the finding of a trunk stowed somewhere in this city, but in what locality we can not find out. This package was conveyed to the dead house. It was then opened in the presence of the Mayor, coroner, deputy coroner, and other magistrates—and in this Boston trunk was found the body of a very beautiful young female covered carefully up with green gauze. The mysterious package was said to have been delivered at the Boston agency by a man who paid for it to come on to this city, where he said it would be inquired for on the arrival of the boat. We learn further, that the body in the trunk has been recognised by the parents of a young lady who lately left the city with her lover on a visit to Boston; and it was to secure the arrest of this miscreant, who is said to have violated and killed the girl, that the whole affair was not to get in the papers until after the inquest, which is fixed for nine o'clock this day.—Aurora.

The Steamers.—The British steamer Unicorn arrived at Boston on Sunday, from Halifax, whence she started on Friday afternoon. The Cunard steamer Caledonia had not urived at Halifax.

The Unicorn comes in her place to take the mail to day, and will proceed with it and the passengers to England, if the Caledonia shall not have arrived on her return to Halifax.

A good deal of apprehension is felt here in regard to the safty of the Caledonia, and the more on account of the gale of the 16th, which was very severe on the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. At that date, if she left on her day (Feb 4th,) and made her usual progress, she must have been near the coast. The Best hope now entertained of her is, that from an anticipated deficiency of coal, or for some other reason, she returned to Liverpool, after being a few days out. It is stated that in case of her arrival at Halifax after the departure of the Unicorn for Boston, she would remain at Halifax until the Unicorn's return.

The Niger Expedition.—The Horatio transport, from St. Helena and the coast of Africa, has brought home some of the officers, who had been invalided, belonging to the Niger expedition, and who had come down the river in the Soudan steamer. The accounts are up to the 1st of October, and are most deplorable. The mortality and sickness among the expedition were great in the extreme. Twenty-six had already died, and almost all were ill and unable to do duty. On board the Wilberforce, out of the European portion of the crew of about 50 men, not more than four or five were able to attend to their duty, the others were all laid up, and they were nearly as ill off on board the Albert. At the time the Soudan left it, the expedition had reached the confluence of the Niger and Tehadda, about 270 miles up the river, but it was feared that from the lamentable condition in which it was placed by the sickness and the increasing mortality, among the officers and men, it would be compelled to return to Ascention.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, and likewise a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained, with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

UNITED STATES'

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

CAPITAL,

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!

Incorporated by the State of New York, March 21, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.

CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840, COMBINING

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE

SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon, exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a sum of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent state stocks in London.

Any communication relative to the business of this company, made in New York city, if by letter, to BENJAMIN BALCH, will receive prompt attention. 50tf

POETRY.

For the Register.

My Closet.

When in the east the purple morn
First glimmers to the sight,
And scarce the rising day be born
Nor fully reigns the night;
While all around is mild and still,
The air serene and pure—
Ere evil thoughts the bosom fill,
Or vanities allure;

My closet sought—its portal closed,
With grateful heart and mind composed,
This anxious soul I pour in prayer—
'O Lord to-day extend thy care.'

When day's last flickering beams have fled,
Obeying Time's commands—
Each thought, each deed, each word we've said,
In heaven recorded stands;
When darkness rests upon the land,
Or moonbeams sweetly flow;
While Somnus presses with his hand,
And weariness we know;

I seek my closet as before,
And meekly bowed upon the floor,
This prayer repeat,—If it is thy will,
O God forgive, preserve us still.

When o'er this gladdened hemisphere
The golden sun shines bright,
When all above is calm and clear,
And all below delight;
When Pleasure wakes her siren song,
Bids every care dismiss,
And feigns to lend what joys belong
To realms remote from this;

Mistrustful of deception nigh,
I to my closet quickly fly,
Where in his arms the Lord will take
And guard me then for Jesus' sake.

When raging clouds obscure the sky,
The lightning's flash severe.
Portentous thunders rolling by,
Proclaims destruction near;
While fear and consternation reign,
That shake the stoutest soul—
When trials, disappointment, pain,
With sorrow brim life's bowl;

As erst, when all around was fair,
The only refuge from despair,
I to my closet then repair,
And find relief—for God is there.

A JOYFUL SURPRISE.

On the morning of the first day of the late election an interesting scene might have been witnessed in a low dilapidated dwelling somewhere in this goodly city. At the place and time mentioned, there might have been seen, sitting at a scantily-furnished breakfast table, a man with good phrenological developments, prepossessing physical appearance, but with a countenance moody and irresistible. On his right sat a woman, his wife, little, if any, past the meridian of life, but exhibiting traces of the premature fading of a face and figure still mildly beautiful. At his left sat his daughter—a yet unblighted copy of her patient and sorrow-stricken mother—in all the heathfulness of incipient womanhood. In this young woman's eyes tears were gathering, and as she turned her timid face towards her moody father, they might have been seen glistening like the pearly drops of a summer morning, as the first beams of the sun glances on their chrystal surface.

Her heart was full, and her voice tremulous, as she at length gained courage sufficiently to ejaculate, "Father!" The moody man started as though the sound of long forgotten melody echoed in his ears. He bent his gaze inquiringly on his trembling child, and in accents unusually soft for him, said "Well, Bell, what would you?" Bell felt emboldened, and dressing her face in a sweet, pleading smile, replied, "I would, father, that you would not go to the election to-day." The frown re-appeared—it was stern and bitter, as he asked sharply, "Why not?" She seemed anxious to escape from the angry gaze of a father, whom, but a moment before, she hoped to conciliate. She was about to withdraw, when a voice of startling fierceness said to her, "Girl, look on your father! You, but a child, presume to counsel him as to what he should do, and in this you doubtless act as the agent of your mother. I could have borne to have been called a drunkard—aye, a drunkard!"—and a shiver passed over him—"but," continued he, "to have it insinuated by a child is too much, I shall go to the election. So, bring me my hat." No word of remonstrance was heard, and the miserable man rushed from his dwelling.

That day bitter tears were shed around the hearth stone of Powell P——. Noon came, but so did not the father of the grief-stricken Isabel. Night too, with its darksome loneliness, drew its curtains around, but no signs of the infatuated—fallen father and husband. Tediously wore the hours of night away. Often did the mother and daughter instinctively cling to each other as some casual noise induced the belief that the object of their solicitude had indeed come, but how did they dread to encounter the frowns—mayhap the inebriate curses of him who was the cause of their vigils! At length the hour of midnight sounded, and as its echoes died away, the footsteps of the expected one were heard. How wildly beat the hearts of mother and daughter as Powell P. entered that door so long and eagerly watched! He was there before them, but not noisy, not harsh—for he was sober, calm, and collected—So great was the joy of wife and daughter, that neither could give utterance to the wild emotions that played around their hearts, but they would not have spoken then, for worlds, lest the echo of a voice should have dispelled what seemed a pleasing allusion.

"Mabel! Isabel!" were the first words that greeted their ears, and in a moment both were crying for joy on his bosom.—We need not detail the affecting conversation which followed, nor the joyful surprise with which the mother and daughter heard his resolves and hopes. It will be sufficiently understood from a single expression of Powell P. as his daughter was about to retire to rest. They were the sweetest words her ears had heard for many a long, long day. They were—"Good night; my child, and may God ever bless you; you have saved your father!"

That father had been to the election—he went predetermined to drink—to get drunk;—but as he was about to raise the first dram to his mouth, the pleading countenance of his daughter seemed to rise before him! His good genius prevailed—the glass was replaced, untasted, on the counter—he left the place, and with a high moral purpose, hastened to enroll himself among the advocates of Temperance.

The pledge has been religiously kept—the visage of his mild and amiable wife is fast losing its care-worn expression—'Bell' is a joyous creature—and Powell P. is fast regaining all his former vigor and nobleness.

Often do these contented beings talk over past scenes, while the amiable "Mabel" fails not to designate the night of which we have spoken, as that of "The Joyous Surprise!"

MEDICAL WARFARE.

A case was tried in the Justice's court at Harlem, on the 11th inst., which is too interesting to pass unnoticed. It seems that Harlem has two physicians, Dr. Mulner, and Dr. Helme, who, of course, love each other exceedingly. Dr. Helme, having recently established himself there, was regarded by the other as trespassing upon his manor, and Dr. M. had, therefore, lost no opportunity of speaking in terms not the most flattering of his brother in physic.—Among other things, he had said that Dr. H. was not a regular physician, and could not collect his bills by law. This suit was brought by Dr. H. to prove that he could; for it seems that Mulner had once asked him to a consultation for the purpose of quizzing and abusing him. High words passed between them on the spot, and Helme presented his bill of $5, as his consultation fee, and demanded payment, which was refused. Each party was his own counsel.

Dr. J. S. Oatman, a physician of this city, was first summoned as a witness. He testified to the authenticity of the diploma and other documents presented by Dr. Helme, and in answer to a question by Dr. Mulner, said that he had known several cases in which one physician had charged another for professional services.

Mulner, (highly excited,)—Name one, sir, if you can.

Oatman—I once knew a case which occurred in a small town in Massachusetts. An old physician had for several years been brow-beating a younger one in the town, and one day sent for him to come and hold a consultation at the house of one of his neighbors. The young physician arrived, and the elder one pointed to a large dog which was standing in the room, and said, "there, sir, you see the tail of that dog curls beautiful over his back, forming a perfect circle. Now, I want you to straighten that dog's tail; and when you have done so effectually, I will give you credit for more surgical knowledge than I now believe you possess." The young physician at once took out his instruments, secured the dog, cut and gashed his tail, and placed it between splinters and bandages, and left the house. The next day he called, and found the bandages had been removed; but he immediately replaced them. He called eight successive days with the same result. On the ninth day, he found upon calling that the dog was not at home; so taking it for granted that his tail had become straightened, he discontinued his visits, and presented his bill for $90, ($10 a visit,) to the senior physician. Payment was refused, and a suit was brought. The case was in the county court, and the old gentleman, upon consulting legal counsel, ascertained that he was liable for the debt, and he paid the $90 in hard money, before the case came to trial. [Roars of laughter by the whole audience, in which the Judge was obliged to join.]

Dr. Mulner—That case, sir, however funny you may conceive it, is not to the point.

Dr. Oatman—I think I remember a case which may be considered parallel to this now on trial.

Dr. Mulner—Relate it sir.

Dr. Oatman—A learned and talented physician moved into a town in New Hampshire, and all the resident physicians at once joined in common war against him.—They tried every plan to bring him into disrepute, and finally invited him to deliver before them a course of lectures on anatomy, informing him at the same time, that they had a subject ready for him. He complied with their request, and on the day named he appeared in their lecture room. He found the dissecting tables arranged, and the subject covered over with white muslin. On removing the cover, the subject was found to be a huge bull frog. The lecturer exhibited no signs of surprise, but after gravely examining his subject, he produced his scalpel and commenced dissecting it. He commenced a lecture upon comparative anatomy; and soon convinced his auditors that they had woke up the wrong passenger. They soon became charmed with the admirable manner in which he handled his subject, and when, after speaking nearly an hour, he announced that his next lecture on the same subject would take place on the following evening, he was greeted with applause. He delivered five lectures with honor to himself and satisfaction to his hearers. Then came the sequel. He presented his bill of $15 each against those who invited him to lecture before them. They would not pay, and he sued them. The case was tried, and the court awarded him the amount of his claim.

The Judge, in the present case, took two or three days to consider, and then rendered a verdict of $5 and costs—in all $11, for the plaintiff. Hereafter Dr. Mulner will probably count the cost before he attempts practical jokes upon his brother physicians.

THE MORAL COURAGE OF PAUL.—The appearance of Paul before the Areopagus of Athens, involved an exhibition of moral courage that has seldom been equalled, and perhaps never surpassed in the history of man. He was in the presence of the statesman, philosophers, orators, and poets of the most intellectual and refined nation upon earth. He was there to humor no popular sect, to flatter no national vanity, to move upon no springs of ambition or future fame. He was there to unfold, to fortify, and rivet upon the conscience and judgment of his enlightened auditory, doctrines at variance with every previous conviction, and present impulse: doctrines totally subversive of that faith in which they were born, in which their fathers died, and which they wished to bequeath to their offspring.

He had no splendid and imposing forms of worship, or mythological mysteries to aid his arguments, or conciliate the pride of his audience. He had no divinities peopling each hill and vale, and grove, and fount to take the places of those whom he disclaimed. He had only the pure abstract conception of the one supreme, holy, and self-existing God: his universal providence and man's final accountability. He delivered his message as one raised by his mighty theme above the frown, or the commendation of his hearers. He was too clear and discriminating for the subtile snares, too earnest and impressive for the sceptical jest, and too cogent and massive in thought for the dialectical evasion. And though no corresponding results were immediately obvious, yet convictions were planted there which struck at length into the very heart of Greece: and which finally enthroned a forsaken God upon the affections and allegiance of a repentant nation.—Phil. N. American.

Any farmer may pay for his newspaper for years with the proceeds of a single hen, well bred to laying eggs; and one bushel of buckwheat, with a very few potatoes, will keep a hen's crop full during the winter—and two hours labor on a suitable soil will often be sufficient, without any manure, to raise a bushel of buckwheat. Who that has lands, cannot afford to take a newspaper?—Mass. Ploughman.

"Soft winds and bright blue skies make me or dispose me to be a sad idler; and it is only by an effort, and a strong feeling of necessity, that I can fix my mind steadily to any sedentary pursuit when the sun is shining over the mountains, and the birds singing "at heaven's gate;" but I find frost and snow most salutary monitors, and always make exertion my enjoyment during their continuance. For this reason I must say I delight in the utmost rigor of winter, which almost seems to render it necessary that the mind should become fully acquainted with its resources, and find means, in drawing them forth, to cheer with "mental light the melancholy day."—Mrs. Hemans.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S HOUSE.—How vain are often our most cherished hopes and ambition! Sir Walter Scott expected—toiled—and died—to found an estate.—His family was then numerous; and the Scotts of Abbotsford were, in his imagination, to rival any of the Border Chiefs of the olden time. A long line of descendants would regard him the poet-founder of the family, with pride and veneration. It seems certain now, that the direct succession will not continue beyond the present generation. His eldest son has no family; the second has died in a foreign country without issue: both his daughters are dead. Misfortune and death have lowered the crest of Abbotsford; and the halls which Sir Walter took such pride in rearing, will scarcely ever again be trod by one of his children. The only survivor is now in India.—Leed's Mercury.

OLD MEMBERS, &C.—The only man now remaining in Congress who was a member at the commencement of Mr. Williams' career, is the Hon. John Taliaferro, (pronounced Tollaver,) of Va., now about seventy years of age. He was a member in 1801, of the 7th Congress in 1811, of the 12th, in 1824 to '31, including part of the 18th and to the 22d, inclusive; and from 1837, the 25th Congress to the present time—only, however, about sixteen years in all. Members from other states have served long terms in Congress—for example, the Hon. John Read, of Mass., served from 1813 to 1817, and from 1821 to 1841—24 years. Mr. Randolph, of Va., and Mr. N. Macon, of N. C., each served in the house 25 years—the former about two years in the Senate; the latter 13—making 38 years of Congressional service; six of which he was Speaker, viz. from 1801 to 1807. Mr. John W. Taylor, of N. Y., served 20 years, and was twice elected Speaker. Mr. Lewis Condit, of N. J., served 18 years—both highly distinguished men. Mr. W. Findlay, of Pa., served 22 years, also with distinction.—Philad. Ledger.

THE FIRST GLASS OF WINE.

Young Ladies, read it.—Young Men, read it.

Mr. Hiram J. Thomas, in giving some account of his history and experience, related the following thrilling occurrence:

"When I was about eighteen years old," said Mr. T., "and a resident of Wayne county, Indiana, I became very intimate with two young men. They were moral and respectable. We often met in the social circle. At a party one evening I saw a young lady—and a lovely young lady she was—offer my young friend K—— a glass of wine. I saw him falter and hesitate, for he was a total abstinence man, though he had never signed the pledge. Upon her insisting upon his drinking, I saw him shrink back from her importunity; yet, as she continued to insist, he could not refuse, for she was his affianced bride.

Two years after, she was the mother o an infant child, and the wife of a drunken husband. In the autumn of '38, he sought a refuge from those who had witnessed his degradation in the wilds of Iowa. Only last March, my other friend was traveling in the territory, and he thought that he would inquire about our mutual friend K——. What do you imagine were his feelings on being told the sad tale of the end of K——. About a year and a half ago, a neighbor of K—— called in one morning to see how the family were, and there within his death-cold hand was the fatal knife, with which he had murdered his wife, his child, and himself. There they lay prostrate upon the floor, weltering in their blood together.

All this was the result of drinking that first glass of wine, of which he knew the danger, and to which he was invited by her whom he loved better than any being on earth.

But that glass of wine cost the poor thoughtless, but then gay girl, her life—the life of her child—the life of her husband! From that single glass of wine he went down to a drunkard's grave.

"Hallo, Mr. W." said a well dressed farmer to us the other day—"likely enough you don't know me."

"Reckon not," said we.

"Well," said he, "I attended one of your lectures up in our parts here, awhile ago, and after you had got through, you came round and asked me to sign the pledge. I didn't sign, but told you I would wait and think of it. "Well," says you, "now bear in mind, and when you get the next glass of grog up to your lips just wait a moment and think of it."—Well, I drank a number of times after that, and didn't think any thing about it. But one day last week I happened into a rum shop, and, as usual, called for a glass of grog; but just as I got it to my mouth, I thought of what you said, and so I hesitated for a moment. I began to think the matter over. and in a few minutes, the rumseller having turned his back, I threw the contents of the tumbler behind a pork barrel, laid down three cents and walked off. The next day I signed the pledge, and now I feel first rate. Good morning Mr. W."

"Good morning, sir."—Washingtonian Banner.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

ROOF'S FOUNDER OINTMENT,

For the cure of foundered horses, split-hoofs, or hoof-bound horses; also, all wounds or bruises in the flesh, galled backs, cracked heals occasioned by overreach, or tread of another horse, Scratches, &c.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct. Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

One of the best medicines for common colds Influenzas &c. &c. &c., to be found in the whole catalogue of patent medicines. Give it a try, it is first rate, call and read one of his circulars.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and use administered to more than 18 000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

N. B. Ask for Dr. M. Hitchcock's Worm Tea, as there are many nostrums abroad for the destruction of worms.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC,

FOR the cure of RING BONE, SPAVIN, WIND GALLS, &c. &c.☞A certain cure in all cases.☜ Many certificates can be shown, and will be if wished, to place this inestimable specific as a perfect cure, beyond a doubt.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

LOOK AT THIS.

HAVE YOU A COUGH?

70 000 DIE OF CONSUMPTION every year in the United States, and millions suffer from troublesome coughs and colds, that can be cured by Dr. Hitchcock's Vegetable Cream Cough Drops, a safe medical prescription, containing no poisonous drugs, and used in an extensive practice for several years will most positively afford relief, and save you from that awful disease, pulmonary consumption, which sweeps into the grave hundreds of the young, the old, the lovely and the gay.

Have you a cough!—Be persuaded to purchase a bottle of the Cough Drops to-day! To-morrow may be too late. Price, 75 cents per bottle.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

We also state, for the benefit of the afflicted, that we have the following valuable MEDICINES, among our large stock.

Doctor Cooper's Pills,
Morrison's Hygean "

Historical Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion.

LECTURE II—THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY S. M. LANGWORTHY.

Having in our former lecture established the genuineness of the New Testament, or in other words having proved that the different pieces which compose this book, and especially the gospels and Acts of the Apostles, were written by their professed authors, we will now proceed to an examination of these witnesses, and see whether they have told the truth or a lie.—But, says the Infidel, I object to this testimony: First, because your witnesses testify to miracles, things which in their nature are so contrary to experience as not to admit of proof from testimony. And second, because these men are interested witnesses.

The first objection has been brought forward and insisted upon by Mr. Hume; and lest I should be accused of misrepresenting his argument, I will state it in his own words: "A miracle, supported by human testimony, is more properly a subject of derision, than of argument. No testimony for any kind of miracle can ever possibly amount to a probability." "We establish it as a maxim, that no human testimony can have such force as to prove a miracle, and make a just foundation for any system of religion." "Our belief or assurance of any fact from the report of eye witnesses, is derived from no other principle than experience; that is, our observation of the veracity of human testimony, and, of the usual conformity of facts to the report of witnesses.—Now if the fact attested partakes of the marvellous, if it is such as has seldom fallen under our own observation, here is a contest of two opposite experiences, of which the one destroys the other as far as it goes.—Further, if the fact affirmed by the witnesses, instead of being only marvellous is really miraculous; if, besides, the testimony considered apart, and in itself amounts to an entire proof, in that case there is proof against proof, of which the strongest must prevail. A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature, and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined. And if so, it is an undeniable consequence that it cannot be surmounted by any proof whatever from testimony. A miracle, therefore, however attested, can never be rendered credible, even in the lowest degree."

To these observations of Mr. Hume, I remark, 1. The laws of nature are no more nor less than the operations of the Deity, in the government of the universe which he has formed. These laws are fixed and uniform, just so long as HE wills them to be fixed and uniform; and when HE, for some good or benevolent purpose, feels disposed to suspend their operation, or even to change it, we have no reason, from our past experience of their uniformity, to believe that he will not to do it. This view of the subject does not, as the objector might at first suppose, argue any change in the character, or purposes of the Deity. It only argues that we know not what His purposes are, until such times as he is disposed to make them known. For aught we know He may always have had this purpose in view. Mr. Hume's definition of a miracle, viz., that "it is a violation of the laws of nature," creates a prejudice in the mind of the unsuspecting reader. He is startled, astonished, and in his confusion is ready to ask, What! has the Deity been violating the laws of nature? Forgetting that these laws were originated in, and are dependent upon His will for their operation, he is impressed with the idea that they are in themselves original independent laws, and that the Deity is under obligations to abide by, and be conformed in all his operations to their action, just as an ox or ass obeys the will of his master. This putting cause for effect and effect for cause is so absurd as would seem to call for no refutation, yet as absurd as it is, it has found its advocates not only in Europe, but also in America. I think it would prevent this misapprehension of the nature of miracles, to say that they are events opposed or contrary to what every man knows to be the uniform course of nature.

2. Mr. Hume says, "The very same principle of experience which gives us a certain degree of assurance in the testimony of witnesses, gives us also, in this case, (i. e. of miracles) another degree of assurance against the fact which they endeavor to establish; from which contradiction there arises, necessarily, a counterpoise and mutual destruction of belief and authority." This argument will apply with equal force to the evidence of the senses; for it is by this same principle of experience that we rely with so much confidence upon their evidence; they have also sometimes deceived us, as in cases of spectral illusions, therefore in cases of miracles as we have the testimony of uniform experience against the testimony of the senses, from which contradiction there necessarily arises a counterpoise and mutual destruction of belief, we cannot believe in a miracle though we see it with our eyes any number of times. This conclusion no one will admit, and yet it is a fair deduction from Mr. Hume's premises. If then we cannot admit the conclusion we must not the premises.

3. What does Mr. Hume mean, when he says a miracle cannot be believed because it is opposed to universal experience? Is not this the very definition of a miracle, that it is opposed to universal experience? His argument then is merely a play upon words—it is saying a miracle cannot be believed because it is a miracle. But there is another difficulty arising from the two-fold use of the word experience. Sometimes our author makes it signify personal experience, and at other times the experience of the whole world. In the first sense the argument would be that no fact which we have not witnessed in person can be established by testimony; especially if it seems to contradict any phenomenon which we have always observed to be constant.

This is precisely the same kind of reasoning as actuated the king of Siam, when told by a Dutch traveler, that in Holland in certain seasons of the year, water became so solid that an elephant might walk over it. "I have believed" said he, "many extraordinary things which you have told me, because I took you for a man of truth and veracity, but now I am convinced that you lie." The fact is, this king had always experienced water to be fluid, and it was with him an established law of nature, when therefore he was informed that water sometimes became solid, it opposed his uniform experience, and according to Mr. Hume's doctrine it was a lie.

Mr. Hume uses the term experience in the second sense when he says, "That a dead man should come to life has never been witnessed in any age or country." According to this sense of the word his argument amounts to a mere assumption of the point in dispute, a petitio principii, or begging the question. The question at issue is, whether miracles have ever been experienced; and Mr Hume tells us they have not, because they are contrary to experience. If they have ever taken place, they are not contrary to universal experience, for what any man has ever witnessed makes a part of universal experience. What sort of argument is that against the truth of miracles, which is founded on an assumption that they never happened?

4. But what is this universal experience which is brought with such mighty force against the evidence of testimony? Why it is the experience of all men in all countries, that the laws of nature are fixed and uniform. And how do we know that all men in all countries have experienced this—do we know it from experience or from testimony? From testimony if we know it at all, the argument then amounts to this; Miracles cannot be supported by testimony, because they are contrary to experience, and experience is an infallible guide because testimony has established it.

When opposite testimonies are brought in contact it is just and right to subtract the weaker from the stronger, and take the remainder as the evidence in the case. But if I had a suit at law, in which I could prove by positive testimony that my neighbor had injured either my property or character, I should not be much disturbed if a man should tell me that my suit would fail, because he could prove by 50 or even 500 men that they never knew my neighbor to injure my property or slander my character. Their not knowing, or non-experience of this matter would have no weight before an enlightened and unprejudiced court, but on the other hand would be the very reason why my positive proof should decide the court in my favor. This is exactly the case in regard to the miracles of the gospel, a few men come forward and testify that a man rose from the dead, but the objector says, no, that can't be so, I can bring forward a greater number of men to testify they never experienced any thing of that kind. Every one must see that such testimony does not in the least invalidate the testimony of the first witnesses.

AN OLD SECT REVIVED.

Messrs. Editors,—In these days of "itching ears," permit one, who loves "the good old way," to call the attention of your readers to some observations that I have met with in an old book, too little known, entitled "A Treatise concerning Religious Affections," by President Edwards: I refer not to the mutilated and remodelled edition by Ellerby, which I am sorry to perceive has been adopted by the American Tract Society.

If I mistake not, the characters described in the following extracts have survived to our day. In part III. Sect. VI., he speaks of "evangelical humiliation," as an invariable accompaniment of "gracious affection." In distinguishing this kind of humiliation from all others, he remarks:

"There is a pretended great humiliation, being dead to the law, and emptied of self, which is one of the most elated things in the world. Some there are who have made great profession of experience of a thorough work of the law on their own hearts, and of being brought fully off from works, whose conversation has savored most of a self-righteous spirit, of any that ever I had opportunity to observe. Some, who think themselves quite emptied of themselves, confident that they are abased in the dust, are full as they can hold with the glory of their own humility, and lifted up to heaven with an high opinion of their abasement.—Their humility is a swelling, self-conceited, confident, showy, noisy, assuming humility."

"He that is under the influence of this distemper, is apt to think highly of his attainments in religion as comparing with others. It is natural for him to fall into that thought of himself, that he is an eminent saint, that he is very high amongst the saints, and has distinguishingly good and great experiences. That in the secret language of his heart—Luke xviii. 21, 'God! I thank thee that I am not as other men;' and, Isa. lxv. 5, 'I am holier than thou.' Hence such are apt to put themselves forward among God's people, as it were, to take a high seat among them, as if there was no doubt of it but it belonged to them. It is natural for them to take it for granted that it belongs to them to do the part of dictators and masters in matters of religion." Works of President Edwards V. 196—8.

There are also described as "being forward to take upon them the place and business of the chief; to guide, teach, direct and manage. They are confident that they are guides to the blind, a light of them which are in darkness, instructors of the foolish, teachers of babes. Rom. ii. 19, 20."

I have understood that of late they have grown wiser than their teachers are, and profess to "better know the Lord." They are in the habit of speaking of their pastors with affected pity, as lamentably deficient in Christian experience, and therefore not competent to instruct such eminent saints as they are; I have heard also that, so much are they impressed with this conviction, that they have it in contemplation to form, here in New York, a kind of "Santification-church," and to have a succession of Sanctification-preachers that they may be "fed."

I have been told too that this class of persons abound very much in telling their wonderful experiences; sometimes giving it out before hand as the subject of discourse at a public meeting, to get as many to hear it as they can. This confirms me yet more in the supposition that these are the very ones whom President Edwards had in mind, when he wrote the following:—

"The persons that talk thus about their experiences, when they give an account of them, expect that others should admire them. Indeed they do not call it boasting to talk after this manner about their experiences, nor do they look upon it as any sign of pride, because they say, they know it was not they that did it, it was free grace; they are the great things that God has done for them; they would acknowledge the great mercy God has shown them, and not make light of it. But so it was with the Pharisee; Luke xviii. He in words gave God the glory of making him to differ from other men; 'God! I thank Thee,' says he, 'that I am not as other men.' Their verbally ascribing it to the grace of God, that they are holier than other saints, does not hinder their forwardness to think so highly of their holiness being a sure evidence of the pride and vanity of their minds. If they were under the influence of an humble spirit, their attainments in religion would not be so apt to shine in their own eyes, nor would be so much in admiring their own beauty. Some go by the name of high professors, and some will own themselves to be high professors; but eminently humble saints, that will shine brightest in heaven, are not at all apt to profess high. I do not believe that there is an eminent saint in the world that is a high professor. Such will be much more likely to profess themselves to be the least of all saints, and to think that every saint's attainments and experiences are higher than his." V. 199, 200.

Again, I have been told that some of these persons go so far as really to question whether they have any remaining sin or not. Indeed, I heard one of them recently offer up public prayer twice in the same day, without even asking for forgiveness. Nor did he confess that he needed it. He merely said, 'If there be any depravity in us, we pray Thee to take it away.' This feature of their character is strikingly depicted by Edwards, as follows:

"The nature of many high religious affections, and great discoveries (as they are called,) in many persons I have been acquainted with, is to hide the corruption of their heart, and to make it seem to them as if all their sin was gone, and to leave them without complaints of any hateful evil left in them, (though it may be they cry out much of their past unworthiness;) a sure and certain evidence that their discoveries are darkness and not light. It is darkness that hides men's pollution and deformity; but light let into the heart, discovers it, searches it out in its secret corners, and makes it plainly to appear; especially that penetrating, all-searching light of God's holiness and glory." V. 204.

A friend remarked to me a day or two since, respecting one of the most noted of this class, that while he endeavored to make the impression on others that he was very meek, it was easy to see that it was an effort—a constraint—it was not natural, it did not seem to flow from a fountain of meekness within; and that, therefore, the character could not be sustained very long. Here again the picture drawn by Edwards is to the life:

"Real humiliation is what all the most glorious hypocrites, who make the most splendid show of mortification to the world, and high religious affection, grossly fail in. They endeavor to make a great show of humility in speech and behavior, but they commonly make bungling work of it, though glorious work in their own eyes. They cannot find out what a humble speech and behavior is, or how to speak and act so that there may indeed be a savor of Christian humility in what they say or do; that sweet, humble air and mien is beyond their art, being not "led by the Spirit," or naturally guided to a behavior becoming holy humility, by the vigor of a lowly spirit within them. And therefore they have no other way, many of them, but to be much in declaring that they are humble." V. 194.

What judgment Edwards would form of those "chiefest" among the saints, were he now living, may be conjectured from what he says, V. 205, 6: "I will not deny that it is possible, that he who has much grace, and is an eminent saint, may know it: But he will not be apt to know it; it will not be obvious to him. That he is better than others, and has higher experiences and attainments, is not a foremost thought, nor does it readily offer itself. It is not in his way, but lies far out of sight; he must take pains to convince himself of it; there will be need of a great command of reason, and a high degree of strictness and care in arguing to convince himself.—And if he be rationally convinced by a very strict consideration of his own experiences, compared with the great appearances of low degrees of grace in some other saints, it will hardly seem real to him that he has more grace than they. He will be apt even to lose the conviction he has by pains obtained; never will it seem at all natural to him to act upon that supposition.

"And this may be laid down as AN INFALLIBLE THING: That the person who is apt to think that he, as compared with others, is a very eminent saint, much distinguished in Christian experience, in whom this is a first thought that rises of itself, and naturally offers itself, is certainly mistaken; he is no eminent saint at all; but under the prevailings of a proud and self-righteous spirit. And if this be habitual with the man, and, is statedly the prevailing temper of his mind, he is no saint at all; he has not the least degree of any true Christian experience; so surely as the word of God is true."

Now, Messrs. Editors, unless you can prove to me that these men know vastly more of their own hearts, human nature, and the word of God, than President Edwards did, that he was a mere tyro in theology and science of mind, as compared with them; you will pardon me if I say that I regard what he has said above, as eminently applicable to many in our day who have embraced what they call the doctrine of Christian Perfection.

BENEFITS OF ASTRONOMY.

Of all the sciences pursued by man, Astronomy is, undoubtedly, one of the most useful, the most interesting, and the most sublime.

Were it not for this science, the figure and density, circumference and diameter of the earth, and the relative situations of places on its surface, could never have been known. This science has also enriched navigation; for, without it, the mariner could not direct his course to the desired haven. Agriculture is likewise benefitted by this science. The successful husbandman depends upon this science for a knowledge of the most proper season of the year, for tillage and sowing. Chronology relies wholly on celestial observations. The revolution of the planets is the great natural time-piece, without which we should have no accurate knowledge of the lapse of time; but these, moving in their orbits so accurately as not to vary one hundredth part of a second in a thousand years, give us the time of the city. Astronomy also aids in religion. It enables the mariner to carry the Christian colony, and thousands of missionaries, to illume the dark corners of the earth with the word of Him, who is the "Light of the world." Lastly, the knowledge of astronomy dissipates superstitious notions. Formerly, a total eclipse of the sun or moon, or the approach of a blazing comet, was regarded as ominous of wars, famines, or death; but now, where astronomy is understood, they are hailed with great pleasure.

What can be more interesting to an inquiring mind, than to study the causes of the different phenomena which we observe in the heavens? What science opens to the mind more enlarged views of the great "I AM," who hath so accurately balanced world on world, and system on system? Truly as said the immortal Dr. Young, "an undevout astronomer is mad." The nearest fixed star has been proved by mathematical demonstration to be twenty billions of miles from the earth, and Dr. Herschel has calculated that the distance of the remotest nebulæ, exceeds that of the nearest fixed star at least three hundred thousand times. Light, which flows at the rate of nearly two hundred thousand miles in a second, would be three years and eighty-two days in passing from the nearest fixed star to the earth. At this rate, the light from the farthest would require, at least, one million of years to pass over the mighty interval; hence, the most distant nebulæ must already have had an existence in the sidereal heavens a million of years, to send out those rays by which we now perceive it. But who will say our glasses reach any limits of the creation? Who will say that if the disembodied spirit should travel forward, with the velocity of thought, a million of years, though myriads of systems would be explored, that myriads would not still be unexplored? Who can bound Omnipotence? In view of this subject, Eudosia has beautifully said,

> "He who admires not, to the stars is blind."

What perfection in wisdom—what unlimited power—what divine goodness shines forth from these orbs of heaven—lamps of night! We behold not one world only, but a system of worlds, regulated and kept in motion by the sun; not one system only, but millions of systems, multiplied in one geometrical ratio without end, always obedient to the laws which govern them.

> "Oh how unlike the complex works of man, > Heaven's easy, artless, unencumbered plan."

With such a view of the material creation, can we not say with the Psalmist, "When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon, and the stars which thou hast ordained, what is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man that thou visitest him?"

D. S. H.

From the Clinton Seminary Advocate.

> "Man has a mind,
> Deep and immortal, and it will not feed
> On pageantry."

When this sphere, this mite among created worlds was spoken from a chaotic mass into an organized body, and the various elements were filled with animated life, whose natures were well adapted to the position they were to occupy in the new existence, Jehovah rested to survey the work of his hand. As the august One glanced from object to object, observing the perfectness of all the parts, and the undividing link that connected the various orders of existences, a radiant smile beamed upon his countenance; but when he arrived at his last, more noble and perfect work, and beheld concealed within the lovely exterior, the spirit gem—the immortal spark—an inexpressible expression played upon his features, which in mortal would be sacrilege even to attempt to describe—and he exclaimed "half divinity!"

O that mind had remained thus! But it was linked with clay, and in an evil hour it stooped from its high pedestal. Yes, the nobler listened to the inferior, and then its glory departed.

For ages it groped in darkness—deep and gloomy darkness—till the Creator, in pity for man's extreme weakness, permitted his Son to be an inhabitant of earth, an associate of humanity, that, if possible, he might regain a part of the nobleness he had lost. He accomplished the object, and laid the basis of a noble structure, that is as illustrious as it is imperishable.

Mind has not yet arrived at the zenith of its glory. It is to advance on, on, on. It was destined to an illimitable progression, and "one might as well think of erecting a tower whence he could grasp the Pleiades, as to attempt to oppose its march." On account of its intimate connection with living dust, its progress is somewhat retarded; yet we have the pleasing hope that the six thousand years of man's bondage is nearly completed, when we are "assured, mind shall be unshackled," and shall wing its way to a more congenial region, where with seraphs and cherubs as its companions, the Triune as its leader, it shall soon arrive at the millenium of its glory. There we must leave it. It is in a state too holy, too pure for the corporeal sense even to conceive.

Has the Creator with a partial hand distributed this inestimable boon, or has the immortal treasure been given into the possession of all? are questions surely worthy of our peculiar regard. If the monitor within says this treasure is ours, let us be wise, and use the various means within our reach to beautify and ornament it in such a manner, that it may be well fitted for the place to which it is destined.

Little Caleb and his Grand-Mamma.

Caleb's countenance was pale; and he was slender in form, and delicate in appearance. He had been sick, and even now he was not quite well. His little taper fingers rested upon the window sill, while his grandmother opened her little Bible and began to read. Caleb sat still in her lap with a serious and attentive expression of countenance.

"'Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican.'"

"What is a Pharisee and a Publican?" asked Caleb.

"You will hear presently. 'And the Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself: God, I thank thee I am not as other men are—extortioners, unjust, adulterers.'"

"What are all these, grandmother?" asked Caleb.

"O, different kinds of crimes and sins. The Pharisee thanked God that he had not committed any of them."

"Was he a good man, grandmother?"

"Very likely he had not committed any of these great crimes."

"'Or even as this publican.' A publican, you must know, was a tax gatherer. He used to collect the taxes from the people. They did not like to pay their taxes, and so they did not like the tax gatherers, and despised them. And thus he thanked God that he was not like the publican. 'I fast twice in the week. I pay tithes of all that I possess.'"

"Tithes!" said Caleb.

"Yes; that was money which God had commanded them to pay. They were to pay in proportion to the property they had. But some dishonest men used to conceal some of their property so as not to have to pay so much; but this Pharisee said he paid tithes of all that he possessed."

"That was right, grandmother!" said Caleb.

"Yes," said his grandmother, "that was very well."

"If he really did it," continued Caleb doubtfully. "Do you think he did, grandmother?"

"I think it very probable. I presume he was a pretty good man outside."

"What do you mean by that, grandmother?" asked Caleb.

"Why, his heart might have been bad, but he was probably pretty careful about all his actions, which could be seen of men. But we will go on."

"'And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying God be merciful to me a sinner! I tell you this man went down to his house justified rather than the other.'"

"Which man?" said Caleb.

"The publican."

"The publican was justified," said Caleb; "what does justified mean?"

"Forgiven and approved. God was pleased with the publican because he confessed his sins honestly; but he was displeased with the Pharisee, because he came boasting of his good deeds."

Here there was a pause. Caleb sat still and seemed thoughtful. His grandmother did not interrupt him, but waited to hear what he would say.

"Yes; but, grandmother, if the Pharisee really was a good man, was it not right for him to thank God for it?"

"It reminds me of Thomas's acorns!" said Madam Rachel.

"Thomas's acorns!" said Caleb; "tell me about them, grandmother."

"Why, Thomas and his brother George were sent to school. They stopped to play by the way until it was so late that they did not dare to go in. Then they staid playing about the fields till it was time to go home. They felt pretty bad, and out of humor, and at last they seperated, and went home different ways. In going home, Thomas found an oak tree with acorns under it. 'Ah!' said he, 'I will carry mother home some acorns.' He had observed that his mother was pleased whenever he brought her things, and he had an idea of soothing his mother's favour, by the good deed of carrying her home some acorns. So when he came into the house he took his hat off carefully, with the acorns in it, and holding it in both hands, marched up to his mother with a smiling face and a look of great self-satisfaction, and said, 'Here, mother, I have got you some acorns.'"

"And what did his mother say?" asked Caleb.

"She shook her head sorrowfully, and told him to put the acorns away. She knew where he had been."

"Then presently, George came in. He put away his cap, walked in softly, and put his face down in his mother's lap, and said, with tears and sobs, 'Mother, I have been doing something very wrong.' Now which of these do you think came to his mother right?"

"Why, George," said he, certainly."

"Yes, and that was the way the publican came; but the Pharisee covered up his sins, being pleased and satisfied with his acorns."

Here Madam Rachel paused, and Caleb sat still thinking of what he had heard. Madam Rachel then closed her book, and in a low, gentle voice, she spoke a few words of prayer, and then she told Caleb that he must always remember, in all his prayers to confess his sins fully and freely, and never cover them up and conceal them, with an idea that his good deeds made him worthy. Then she put Caleb down, and he ran down stairs to play.—S. S. Adv.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, March 23, 1842.

Light Wanted.

The following we find in the Baptist Record, published at Philadelphia:

"THE LORD'S DAY.—We are rejoiced "to see a growing disposition to pay at "least an external respect to the command "of Jehovah to observe one day in seven "as a day of rest from secular cares and "labors," &c.

Will Br. Rhees inform us where that "command of Jehovah" can be found?—Please point out chapter and verse? We feel unwilling to violate the letter or spirit of any of GOD'S commands purposely or ignorantly. If our ignorance has led us into error, it is time we were enlightened. If we have sinned willfully, the command should be constantly held up before us.—Let the case be as it may, we confess that we have as yet been ignorant that God ever gave such a command. Where is it Br. Rhees? And where is the proof that any day of the week is in scripture called Lord's day? We await an answer.

Where is the Difference.

The scripture test of discipleship is love and purity. If a man be in union with God, he will love God, and "he that loves me," says the Savior, "will keep my words." He will also love his neighbor as himself, and consequently when he can will do him good. The religion that he loves forbids selfishness, covetousness, hatred, evil speaking, and every wrong feeling towards his fellow. If a man be united to Christ, he cannot hate his fellow, neither can he do him wrong. The feelings of the natural man are the reverse of these. Every wrong feeling possesses his heart and influences his conduct. Where is the difference between the natural man and the professor who exhibits the same characteristics? The profession of the Christian name is nothing. In these days of impiety it is difficult to determine from men's conduct whether they profess religion or otherwise; and it is frequently equally difficult to see the fruits of holiness in some who are church members. Where is the difference between the man that professes no love to God, and the one that has none? And where is the difference between the church member that lies, and cheats, and profanes the Sabbath, and neither fears God nor regards man, and the one that professes nothing better? By their fruits shall ye know them. In the judgment men's professions will avail them nothing.

Missionary Intelligence.

Our brethren, we are sure, will be much interested with the account of Br. Scott's labors. The field of his labors is an interesting one. Shall he be sustained?—Who would deprive himself of the pleasure he feels in seeing the truth triumph, rather than contribute to the means of carrying it forward. A small pittance from each member of the churches would keep the work in progress.

The Creole Case.

It will be seen from our Foreign News that Great Britain has no law by which the hero mutineers are to be delivered up for trial. The moment they touched British soil they were free, and they will enjoy that freedom.

The war party, throughout the country have something now to fan the flame of war with, and strong fears are entertained by some that this case, in the failure of others, will lead to a war. But it should be borne in mind that none want a Creole war except the South; and they have every thing to lose, and nothing to gain by it. We do not believe that we shall have a rupture with England on this account.

Decision of the Supreme Court of the U. S.

Last week we published the Decision of the Supreme Court of the U. S., relative to fugitive slaves. That decision which is the law of the land, declares all State laws that hinder or interfere with the capture and re-enslavement of fugitives, unconstitutional. This sets at defiance the right of trial by jury, and exposes every man of a colored skin to the rapacity of soul-stealers. No man, whether black or white, (for slaves are not all black,) is safe. "The soul stealers" (as they are familiarly termed at the South) could seize upon any person if they chose and hurry him into slavery. It is feared that this decision will establish a "Lynch Law" throughout the land.—[illegible] feeling is very strong against the decision, and it is doubtful whether kidnappers [illegible] escape with their fugitives in [illegible] of the north.

S. D. B. History.

From repeated requests from different individuals, we issued proposals for publishing a History of the Denomination. Since publishing the proposals we have had some statistics, &c., sent us. We design to collect all the information we can before commencing the work, and again request those who are friendly to the design to aid us all they can. It is not yet determined who will compile, and arrange the History. This much we say, that we will not publish any thing unless it is written or approved by those best capable of judging in the case. And if any thing is done, it shall be to the satisfaction of the Denomination, and be such a work as will be worth possessing. The labor of collecting the materials is very great. It will be impossible for one to do it in years unassisted. Some individuals in each society might, from records and memory, furnish all that would be necessary for the society. Other matters will be taken from the records of the Denomination, and other sources, as best it may. Who will help?

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY—We now forward another irregular scroll, for insertion in the Register. Since our former communication the Lord has been doing a good work here. The meeting that was then in progress, continued nine days, and we believe resulted in much good. Sinners were brought low; and satan's kingdom lost some valiant soldiers.—Some of the most skilled in his infernal tactics, grounded their weapons of rebellion at the Savior's feet. The meeting was kept up with deep interest, and christians could often say with Peter, "Lord it is good for us to be here." People of almost all ages, classes, professions, and conditions attended. Great solemnity pervaded the congregation, for the greater part of the time. And in honor of the people in this village, we must say, that worship was conducted without opposition on the part of unbelievers, and although many fell in their ranks, slain by the sword of the spirit, nought was resisted by them, but the operation of the holy spirit, which may Heaven grant, may not prove their eternal overthrow. God's spirit was blessed to that degree, that sinners came forward declaring their desire for salvation, and many Christians fell before God, crying aloud for mercy for them, and continued so to do until their souls found, at the foot of the cross, a bleeding Savior's dying love. If angels in heaven rejoice over the repenting sinner, may not man with his fellow man? While he sees the stubborn soul yield, and with streaming eyes and uplifted hands cry out, "men and brethren what shall I do." Heaven surely is interested in such scenes. Angels must be delighted while viewing sinners flying from their labyrinth of woe, and flinging their imploring arms around the Savior's feet. See how his melting love causes him to stoop, and take the culprit and press him to his bleeding side—then raise his holy hand to ward off the sword of justice, casting an imploring look to his Father.

> "His Father hears him pray,
> His dear anointed one,
> He cannot turn away,
> The presence of his Son
> The Spirit answers to the blood,
> And tells him he is born of God."

The good work appears deep, and the religious impression extends far and wide. The calls for ministerial labor are far more than we can attend.

Feb. 12—Baptized seven happy converts. This day being Sabbath was a day of unusual interest to all, both saint and sinner.—While we are thus engaged here, the brethren are busy in building up Christ's kingdom at Port Jefferson and Jackson Township. During a quarterly meeting recently held in Jackson, many souls were converted to God.

26th—Sabbath. The meeting house in Jefferson was filled to overflowing. The friends came from Jackson, Quincy, &c., distance from six to ten miles. And what surprised us most was that they were engaged to that degree, that some young ladies came on foot six and seven miles through mist and mud. In conversation they said they were well paid, and were willing to wear themselves out in the cause of their Master. A caution to the dilatory. When we were about to sympathize with them, they cautioned us, and with tears in their eyes, pointed toward heaven, saying, "In my Father's house there are many mansions." One Br. having found the Savior, came twenty miles to be baptized and at the close of the sermon rose and told his errand. The intelligence coming with such earnestness and so unexpected, produced a thrill in the congregation, and for a short time it was a house of weeping and thanksgiving to God for his continued mercy to our lost race. Oh matchless grace that can thus change the Infidel—take him, from this busy world, and lead him that distance to follow his divine Redeemer down the liquid grave. Oh divine master, give us a resting place beneath the covert of thy wing. We then repaired to the bank of the Miami River which flows gently by this town. This was as beautiful and interesting a scene as we ever witnessed. The people skirted the river up and down. The bank was so formed that the gathering multitude ranged in lines, one above another, so that all could with ease behold the scene. The lofty sycamores stood in all their native grandeur along the shore, stretching their branches over the rolling wave, greatly adding to the beauty of the scenery. Our souls were filled. Heaven was begun below.—Through this ordinance, and while upon the banks of this river, we could but cast a wishful eye to "Canaan's happy land," and there behold "the river of life," gently flowing through the City of the Great King. Our heart leaped within us for joy. And were it not for the salvation of others, we could gladly, if permitted, drop this suffering tenement—depart and be with Jesus at peace, but will embrace the spirit of the poet,

> "In hope of that Immortal crown,
> I now my cross sustain,
> And gladly wander up and down,
> And smile at toil and pain:
>
> I suffer on my three-score years,
> Till my deliverer come,
> And wipe away his servant's tears,
> And take his exile home."

We here baptized thirteen, whose ages were from ten to forty-five. The candidates were also happy, and crowded to the water's edge, anxiously waiting with streaming eyes, their turn to follow their divine example down into the river "to be buried with him by baptism." As they rose they went on their way rejoicing, and may they go on until they land on Canaan's blissful shore.

27th—Took leave of the brethren, and made our way to Hampton. While plodding through the mud we cast our minds over this field of labor. The cry on every hand is, "come over and help us." The harvest is great—the fields are all white. The ministers in this county are doing all they can. Br. Church has left Hampton, and gone to join Brn. Hill and Davis in Shelby County, and when we leave Br. Babcock will be the only one to officiate in this county. We rejoice that there have been so many benefitted by the gospel in these counties, and were it not for some obstacles before hinted at, (Oh horrible thought!) there would be a great ingathering. When will all be wise?—When will they see? When will the Church march forth unshackled, appear fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners. May the good Lord roll on the time "when all shall know him from the least to the greatest." There have been thirty-three baptized, and more are expected the first opportunity. Will the friends of Jesus bear our case, together with these people, before the throne of grace? We need your prayers. By permission of divine providence we expect to leave this friend the first of the coming week, and pursue our journey to another field.

Yours in haste,

J. L. SCOTT.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

TWENTY-SIX DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

Last night the steamer Clyde arrived at this port from Halifax. The Acadia had reached Halifax, bringing the important news of the safety of the Caledonia, and other news from Europe as late as the 14th of February.

Return of the Caledonia Steam Ship—The Caledonia, which left Liverpool on the 4th inst., after having been at sea seven days, and experiencing a most terrific gale, has been obliged to put back, with some damage, which, we trust, will prove immaterial. The following extract of a letter from a passenger on board the Caledonia, will explain the difficulties which that noble vessel has had to encounter, as well as the reasons which have led to the untoward event of her return. The letter is dated off Cork, 15th of February:—

"For the first three days after we sailed, we got on admirably, with a fair wind, but on the morning of the 7th, the wind chopped round and commenced blowing very hard.

On the 8th, the storm increased from the westward, and a heavy head sea. It continued throughout the 9th. On the 10th the sea was tremendous, and carried away our fore-starboard bulwarks and ice-house, filled the fore-cabin with water, completely washed out the passengers whose berths were in that part of the vessel, thoroughly saturated all their bedding, and sprung the rudder. Part of the after larboard bulwarks, and the iron rail on the taffrail were twisted off, the wheel-house damaged, and the paddle-box partly stove in.

The gale continued unabated during the 11th. We had to steer by the sails while endeavoring to secure the rudder, (the thin piece of which was completely twisted in the case,) by lashing chains round, passing iron bolts through it, and fixing chains over the stern. At six P. M., (11th,) being then in lat. N. 20, long. 29 W., the captain and officers found it would not be safe to proceed on the voyage, as they were all of opinion that the rudder would not hold together for two hours more against such a heavy sea.

The captain therefore put her head about for the purpose of running into this place for repairs. Lieut. Parsons, R. N., also coincided with the captain and officers.—Notwithstanding all our misfortunes, I must say the Caledonia is a most excellent sea boat, for she rode through the whole gale like a duck. Too much praise cannot be given to Capt. Lott for his courageous and seamanlike conduct through the whole storm—in fact, on all occasions; and I refer you to a series of resolutions you will see published, drawn up by the passengers, acquitting him of all blame." The Caledonia had sixty-three passengers on board.

The Caledonia, after remaining a short time in the Cove of Cork, proceeded to this port, which she reached about seven o'clock on Thursday night. On the 13th inst., as the Caledonia was returning to Cork, the passengers unanimously adopted a memorial, expressive of their confidence in the seaworthiness of the vessel, and in the skill and judgment of Captain Lott, her commander. As a proof that the machinery of the Caledonia has not sustained the slightest injury, we may mention that she came up the river on Thursday night at full speed.

England.—Parliament was opened, as announced by previous arrivals, by the following speech from the Queen:

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I cannot meet you in parliament assembled without making a public acknowledgment of my gratitude to Almighty God on account of the birth of the Prince, my son—an event which has completed the measure of my domestic happiness, and has been hailed with every demonstration of affectionate attachment to my person and government by my faithful and royal people.

"I am confident that you will participate in the satisfaction which I have derived from the presence in this country of my good Brother and Ally, the King of Prussia, who, at my request, undertook in person the office of sponser at the christening of the Prince of Wales.

"I receive from all Princes and States, the continued assurance of their earnest desire to maintain the most friendly relations with this country.

"It is with great satisfaction I inform you that I have concluded with the Emperor of Austria, the King of the French, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Russia, a treaty for the effectual suppression of the Slave Trade, which, when the ratifications shall have been exchanged, will be communicated to Parliament.

"There shall also be laid before you a treaty which I have concluded with the same powers, together with the Sultan, having for its object the security of the Turkish Empire, and the maintenance of the general tranquility.

"The restoration of my diplomatic and friendly intercourse with the Court of Teheran has been followed by the completion of a commercial treaty with the King of Persia, which I have directed to be laid before you.

"I am engaged in negotiations with several powers, which, I trust, by leading to conventions founded on the just principle of mutual advantage, may extend to the trade and commerce of the country.

"I regret that I am not able to announce to you the re-establishment of peaceful relations with the government of China.

"The uniform success which has attended the hostile operations directed against that Power, and my confidence in the skill and gallantry of my Naval and Military Forces, encourage the hope on my part that our differences with the Government of China will be brought to an early termination, and our commercial relations with that country placed on a satisfactory basis.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"The estimates for the year have been prepared and will be laid before you.

"I rely, with entire confidence, on your disposition, while you enforce the principles of a wise economy, to make that provision for the service of the country which the public exigencies require.

"My Lords and Gentlemen:

"I recommend to your immediate attention the state of the Finances and of the Expenditures of the country.

"You will have seen with regret that, for several years past, the annual income has been inadequate to bear the public charges; and I feel confident that, fully sensible of the evil which must result from a continued deficiency of this nature during peace, you will carefully consider the best means of averting it.

"I recommend also to your consideration the state of the laws which affect the importation of corn and other articles, the produce of foreign countries.

"Measures will be submitted for your consideration for the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, and for the improvement of the jurisdiction exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts in England and Wales.

"It will also be desirable that you should consider with a view to their revision, the laws which regulate the registration of electors of members to serve in Parliament.

"I have observed, with deep regret, the continued distress in the manufacturing districts of the country. The sufferings and privations which have resulted from it have been borne with exemplary patience and fortitude.

"I feel assured that your deliberations on the various important matters which will occupy your attention, will be directed by a comprehensive regard for the interests and permanent welfare of all classes of my subjects; and I fervently pray that they may tend, in their result, to improve the national resources, and encourage the industry, and promote the happiness of my people."

The Creole Case.—In the House of Lords, on the 14th of February, Lord Brougham brought before their lordships the case of the Creole. In reply to his questions, the Earl of Aberdeen informed the House that communications had taken place between the Governor of the Bahamas and her majesty's government on the subject. Her majesty's government had given the subject their most anxious attention, and had satisfied themselves that there is no existing authority for bringing the negroes of the Creole to trial for mutiny and murder, still less for delivering them up or detaining them in custody. The Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Stanley, had therefore sent out instructions for their release.

Lord Denman gave his opinion that there was no law, authority, or machinery existing, by which the Secretary of State for the Colonies could deliver up these men to a foreign power, after taking refuge in our dominions; and he declared, on the authority of the most eminent lawyers, that the Secretary of State so delivering up such men to a foreign state, would be liable to the danger of an action of damages for false imprisonment, and the still more awful danger of putting a person upon his trial in a case where the penalty was death. It was very clear that an alien, seized in this country for an alleged crime committed in a foreign country, might resist his apprehension with force, and if the resistance cost him his life, the seizing party might be arrested for murder, and, if found guilty, executed. It was desirable that an international jurisdiction should be established by treaty; but the existence of the slave trade stood in the way.

Lord Campbell, Lord Cattenham, and the Lord Chancellor, concurred in Lord Denman's statement of the law.

Lord Brougham stated that Lords Wynford and Abinger had authorized him to express their assent to the same opinion.

Lord Brougham then withdrew his motion, and the House adjourned.

The petition against the corn laws from Preston has received nearly 17,000 signatures, and the memorial to the Queen from the female inhabitants has appended to it 9,600.

The Leed's township petition, for the repeal of the corn laws, received in little more than a week upwards of 43,000 signatures, and the petition from the female inhabitants nearly 24,000

Owing to the generally depressed state of trade in this country, and in all parts of the world, the consumption of wine has fallen off, within the last year, upwards of 300,000 gallons.

Discussion on the Corn Laws.—On the 9th, Sir Robert Peel brought forward his project for a change in the Corn Laws. By the scale he submitted, it is provided that whenever the average price of grain shall be under 51*s.* [$12,24] per quarter, or eight bushels, the duty shall be 20*s.* 6*d.* [$4,92] whereas by the present scale it is 36*s.* 8*d.* [$8,80]; whenever it shall be over 60*s.* [14,40] and under 61*s.* [14,64] the duty shall be 12*s.* [$2,88]; over 65*s.* [15,60] and under 66*s.* [$15,84] it shall be 7*s.* [1,68]; over 70*s.*]$16,80] and under 71*s.* [17,04] it shall be 4*s.* [$0,96] whereas now it is 10*s.* 8*d.* [$2,56]; if it be over 73*s.* [$16,52] the duty shall be 1*s.* [$0,24.]—Lord Russell, Palmerston, and other Whigs generally opposed the bill. Lord John Russell moved an amendment expressive of dissent, in order to test the sense of the House; his amendment was negatived, 349 to 226—a ministerial majority of 123.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

Washington, March 14.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—The doings of the past week have been of so little importance, that I will not follow the daily routine of their stupidity, but present them under different heads as they occur to me. Among the more interesting items were the Passage of the District Bank Bill

by the Senate, by a strict party vote, every Whig voting yea. In the other House it was not made a party question. It was amended so as to compel the District Banks to resume common honesty, whenever those of Richmond and Baltimore do so.

The Two Messages—War and Bankruptcy.

The two special messages from the President made sober faces for one day, especially that which related to the arrest of Hogan, which heartily rejoiced the war party here! For it gave them something by which to link the great free State of New York with the coming struggle against liberty, and in favor of the American slave-trade. Their disappointment at his speedy release is proportionably great. And soberly, the prospect of war, unless our government backs out from its untenable position, is very great. The Madisonian thinks that Great Britain is so dependent upon the South for cotton, that she will submit to be bullied in the Creole and similar cases. A slight mistake, as time will show. The poor Southerners can hardly believe yet, that India cotton is serious in its intention to grow; or that England will, after all, dare to exchange a market for a small amount of her productions in this country, for the vast and open market of India and the East. Why don't they think of the vast mart of CHINA, soon to be opened to England? She can then afford to prohibit American cotton.

The other message declared that the Treasury would be deficient more than $3,000,000 on the 1st of May, and calling upon Congress for new loans, and an extension of the old one to meet the deficit. So, with war at our doors, we have a bankrupt Treasury, and a public debt rapidly increasing!

Mr. Fillmore expressed his decided dislike of any farther loans, or of any issue of Treasury Notes. He preferred these measures which would increase the permanent revenue of the Government. McKeon, of N. Y., at once moved to commit the whole subject to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to report a bill to repeal the Land Distribution Bill of the Extra Session, which was adopted. So that measure is fairly before the country.

The Apportionment Bill

has not, as yet, been reached. The proposition offered by Mr. Everett, to fix the ratio at 50,391, meets with very general favor. It leaves every State its present number of representatives, which soothes the wounded feelings of the Southern States; to whom the loss of their relative political strength is a very bitter pill, and to whom a loss of numbers would be deemed a greater one. It gives New York 48, and Massachusetts 14 members. The smaller States will generally favor it.

Follies and Petitions.

Among the first may be classed petitions for the reversion of the fine laid on Gen. Jackson in 1815, by Judge Hall, in New-Orleans; and one from Medina co., O., for a tax on gold and silver plate, to induce the coinage of these articles into money. The first may be well enough to gratify the old Lion, though it is rather strange the democrats never thought of it when they were in power! And the last involves the sound, but discarded notion of direct taxation. The petitions from the iron interest, and some small classes besides, in favor of a tariff, continue to come in, chiefly from Pennsylvania and New York. To-day, one came from Virginia, which excited much interest, as every indication of a return to tariffism in that quarter of the Union does, and it was ordered to be printed. A long petition from somewhere in E. Tennessee, praying the house to censure Messrs. Wise and Marshall, for their course in relation to Mr. Adams, asserting the right of the people to petition for such objects as they thought proper, inasmuch as they could judge of their own necessities quite as well as their representatives; praying also, that better measures might be adopted to preserve order in the House, etc., was presented, but denied a reception, 70 to 65. Two more petitions for a dissolution of the Union were presented, one by Mr. Morgan, and one by Mr. Barnard of New York. The latter presented the alternative of a rescinding of the 21st rule, or a dissolution. Wise made a most impudent attempt to browbeat the Speaker, and force an immediate vote to refuse the reception of it, after the Chair had decided that another member had given notice of a wish to debate the question of reception. But he did not succeed, and the matter lies over. These petitions excite much alarm among our Southern kinsfolk. They know that when Northern men talk of dissolution, there is some meaning in it. In the debate the other day, on Mr. Gidding's motion concerning the compensation for fugitive slaves, Cooper of Geo., read an extract from a letter, which he said was written by a distinguished Whig in Georgia, to the effect that if Congress continued to be the theatre of such scenes, he, the writer, should be an open advocate of disunion!—Indeed, in all parts of the land, the influences of slavery in various ways, are drawing men's minds to the contemplation of that sad alternative. If the rights of the free continue to be trampled upon, this must be the result.

Resolves Offered—Texas—Tariff—Elections.

The resolves of R. I., in favor of a uniform day and mode of choosing Presidential electors, were presented to the Senate. In the House, the subject has been referred to a committee. It is a matter of some importance, in order to secure the priority of the ballot box.

The resolves of Tennessee, setting forth the fact that our chief agricultural products, including tobacco, were excluded by high duties from various foreign countries, and calling upon Congress to pass countervailing duties on the failure of efforts to negotiate for a better state of things; a system of revenge and self-inflicted torture on account of the economical errors of other nations, were presented and printed. So also were the resolves of the same Legislature in favor of the admission of Texas to the Union. That subject is likewise before the Legislature of Virginia. Will not your readers who regard the salvation of their country, be persuaded that there is a reality in the imminent danger of that act? The petitions against it were to-day referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. Adams Chairman, a majority of which, though slaveholders, are believed to be hostile to the annexation. Yet, while the slaveholders are straining every nerve, and their State Legislatures alive to the means of extending their despotic reign over the country, has become cowardly! And, on the intimation from some of her delegation here, that it might prejudice her militia claims for some paltry dollars, now pending before a committee of which a slaveholder is Chairman, her Legislature designedly omitted to pass resolves to sustain Mr. Adams, and to resist the encroachments of the slave power! Let the people do the work their rulers neglected, or their liberties are gone. I make this statement advisedly.

Massachusetts

Resolves Adopted—Miscellany.

For a select committee to consider and report the best means of separating the public printing from the political press; to instruct the Judiciary Committee to report a bill concerning Juries in the U. S. Courts in Penn., (an old trouble of long standing, growing out of a defect in the State laws. A bill was reported to-day to authorize the Courts to appoint Commissioners to select their own Juries, which was passed, and sent to the Senate;) concerning a Custom House at Savannah; to suspend the Bankrupt Law, and all proceedings under it for one year, a motion which was got rid of for the time, because it was offered on petition day, and the House refused to sustain the previous question on its immediate passage. Also a report from the Committee on Elections, in favor of Hon. J. A. Lowell's right to a seat; a bill in the Senate to increase the salaries of certain Judges, and another to repay Joseph Nourse the money exacted from him in a political prosecution some years ago, were disposed of. The House on Saturday passed about seventy-five private bills, chiefly pension acts, many of which had previously passed the Senate, and have now been approved by the President. So ends my tale of the doings of the week.

News of the Day.

From Peru—Death of the President.—The Journal of Commerce has intelligence from Peru, by the way of Chagres, that the Peruvian army which invaded Bolivia, under the command of Gamarra in person, was totally defeated by the Bolivians, and that Gamarra was slain. The Peruvian loss is represented at 4,000 killed, wounded and prisoners, out of 10,000; that of the Bolivians at only 150 out of 7,000.

Iron Steamboats.—Not many of our readers are advised, we suspect, that somebody is building four iron steamboats—or perhaps they may be sailing vessels—at one yard in this city. The yard is in the space bounded by Washington, West, Jane and Horatio streets. Those who live in the immediate neighborhood, hear the "clink of hammers closing rivets up" all day long; or at least all the time they pass at home. The hull of one of the vessels is nearly completed, and the others are in good progress.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

Lake Navigation.—The ice has entirely disappeared from the lake and harbor, and some of the smaller class of vessels are making trips between points at the West end of the lake. This has given our seamen a fresh impulse to prepare and fit out their respective craft. The various steamers in port are in the hands of the engineers and artizans, who seem to vie with each other in rendering their vessels secure and worthy of patronage.

A company of Yankees has been formed to purchase the Schuylkill Valley rail road in Pa.

The morning Herald, a new penny paper, has been started in Philadelphia to make R. M. Johnson President.

We learn that the postage bills on letters, &c., received at the N. Y. Post Office by the Acadia, amounted to thirty three hundred dollars.

The Great Western is to start from Bristol for New York on the 2d of April. She will this year run alternately to Bristol and Liverpool.

The Secretary of State, S. Young, Esq., has appointed Samuel S. Randall General Deputy Superintendent of Common Schools.

In consequence of a contemplated assignment by the Bank of Pennsylvania, Gov. Porter has recommended the appointment of a Commissioner of Loans, to execute the Fiscal trusts which formerly devolved on that institution.

Every man who owes any thing, no matter how small the amount, may take advantage of the Bankrupt law. But no man can be compelled by his creditors to become a bankrupt under it unless he owes $2000 or more.

The Wiskonsan Legislature proposes to submit to a vote of the people of some 12 or 14 counties of Illinois, the question of being attached to the "new State of Wiskonsan."

The Hartford Courant announces that the venerable Dr. Nott, of Franklin, Conn., preached his sixtieth anniversary sermon on Sabbath last, the 13th inst.

Accounts from Picolata, of the 4th, say that Major Plympton has captured Short-Grass and his party—some 7 or 8 in all.—Three our four persons, women and children, were killed by a small party of Indians, west of the Suwannee, about the 1st of the month.

The bill requiring the Maryland Banks to resume specie payments on or before the 1st Monday in May next, has passed both branches of the Legislature of that State.

A letter of Feb. 15th from Galveston, says the rumors of an invasion of Texas by Mexico had subsided, and the whole affair was considered a humbug.

A Whig Convention is to meet in North Carolina on the 4th of April—the anniversary of Gen. Harrison's death—to nominate Mr. Clay.

In the State of Maine, there are no less than 5,550,723 lbs. of butter, and 1,176,740 lbs. of cheese made annually.

John Farr obtained a verdict of $18,000 against the Schuylkill Navigation Co., in the District Court at Phila., on Tuesday—being the amount of damage for injuries done the Chemical works of the plaintiff by the construction of the works of the Company.

Messrs. Slade of Vermont, and Merriwether of Georgia, are now severely ill at Washington.

The navigation on Lake Erie has opened, and a steamboat arrived at Buffalo from Detroit on the 8th.

The recent murder in the Wiskonsan Legislature has been followed by a bloody encounter in the lobby of that of Iowa; Gen. Van Antwerp, editor of the Iowa City Reporter, having been severely flogged by Mr. Senator Bainbridge, for some newspaper report. A pistol was drawn, but not fired.

Crater, the man who was arrested on charge of murder, immediately on leaving Auburn State Prison, has been examined at Oswego, where the alleged crime was committed, and discharged.

Howard and others in a suit against the Cincinnati Whitewater Canal Company, recovered over $60,000. A bill of exceptions has been taken.

The quantity of raw silk manufactured in this country the past year, was more than 30,000 pounds.

In the Virginia House of Delegates on Tuesday, a resolution was passed, 68 to 53, directing the State Treasurer to receive all money which may fall to Virginia under the Distribution Act.

Anecdote of President Humphrey.—A good story is told of President Humphrey, of Amherst College. One morning before recitation, some of the students fastened a live goose on the President's chair; when he entered the room and discovered the new occupant of his seat, he turned on his heel and coolly observed: "Gentlemen, I perceive you have a competent instructor, and I will therefore leave you to your studies."

University of New York—Commencement.—The first annual commencement of the medical department of the University, was celebrated on Wednesday morning, 9th inst. At 10 o'clock the several faculties, the council, and the students of the different departments assembled at the Medical College building, Broadway; at half past 11 the procession moved in order to the Chapel of the University, where a band of music greeted their entrance, and a full audience of gentlemen and ladies were waiting for their arrival.

The services were opened by reading the 138th and 139th Psalms, and an appropriate prayer by Professor Mason, followed by music.

President of the Council, James Tallmadge, Esq., made a brief statement in behalf of the council. The chancellor of the University, the Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, then conferred the degree of doctor of medicine on fifty-one young gentlemen.

This ceremony being completed, the chancellor delivered an address to the graduated class.

Accident (almost) to the Governors of New York and Massachusetts.—The conductor of the Western train informs us that the Governor of New York and Massachusetts were placed in great bodily fear, if not exposed to the imminent danger of losing their lives, upon the Western Railroad, on Friday night last. The cars arrived at Worcester between 7 and 8 o'clock, on a very dark night. Just before reaching a bridge near the usual stopping place, the conductor stopped the train, and sent to the engine-house for a lighter engine, fearing to cross the bridge with the heavy eight-wheeled locomotive, which had brought the cars from Springfield. Gov. Davis, without waiting to arrive at the depot, left the cars with Gov. Seward and some members of the New-York Legislature, whom he had invited to spend the night at his house, and instead of taking the common highway, they kept upon the track. When they were upon the bridge, in total darkness, the bridge being a covered one, they suddenly heard the engine, (which had been sent for,) rapidly approaching.

All were instantly in the greatest alarm and confusion—some thinking the bridge a very narrow one, and that there was only one track upon it, and every man made the greatest haste possible to get out of the way. Gov. Seward accomplished wonderful feats as a runner, but his course was suddenly interrupted by his tumbling into a hole about a foot deep, in the part of the bridge over the ground, where a plank was gone. He immediately rolled himself "into a ball of considerably less diameter than his body," and as soon as he had somewhat recovered from his fright, he leveled his eye along the bridge to watch the coming of his dread enemy. As it approached, it was easy to see by the fire of the locomotive that there were two tracks, and all on the bridge, with admirable presence of mind, instantly stepped from that upon which the locomotive was moving, and left it to pursue its way unimpeded. Gov. Seward then emerged from his hiding place, and all went on their way rejoicing, to the hospitable mansion of Gov. Davis.—Boston Atlas.

New remedy for Hydrophobia.—Dr. Heller, Member of the Royal Academy of Medicine, Paris, lately communicated to his society, that in Greece it is a practice to observe the tongues of those persons who have been bitten by dogs, because at the end of eight or nine days there appears on each side tongue, and near the upper part, postules called lysses, by the Greeks—These postules contain the whole rabid matter, and immediately they are cut out and the wounds cauterised, which prevents hydrophobia.

The Rochester Post of Tuesday evening says:—"We are authorised by the cashier now to say that the "Farmer's and Mechanic's Bank of Rochester" HAS resumed the payment of all its liabilities; and that its bills are redeemed in specie at its counter."

Another Horrid Tragedy.—Wednesday's mail brought us the following letter from Jesse Carter, Esq., of Alligator, in Columbia county.

ALLIGATOR, Columbia County, Fa.
25th Feb. 1842.

SIR—I must again request you to publish in your paper, for the information of the public, another horrible act of Indian barbarity, and at a time too, when peace is anticipated.

On the afternoon of yesterday, 24th instant, about three o'clock, the house of Mr. Richard Tillis, of this county, (15 miles west of this place, in the vicinity of Capt. McClellan) was attacked by a party of Indians, 10 or 12 in number. Mr. Tillis was from home at the time. Mrs. Tillis and one child were shot dead, (the child was shot with an arrow.) A young lady and two children mortally wounded, the two latter with arrows which have not yet been extracted. The only member of the family who escaped, was an infant three weeks old, which was found unhurt by the wounded lady.

The dead and wounded were this morning brought to the house of Mr. Carver, (the father of the unfortunate lady,) where the mail rider from the West called in this afternoon, and witnessed the scene, from whom I have the particulars. Capt. McClellan and a party of our citizens are now in pursuit of the Indians. We hope for their success, but fear they are too far gone.

We learn from the Fredonia Censor that some villain recently broke into the room and plundered the trunk of the elocutionist, Prof. BRONSON—who is lecturing in that village—of some $300. He then set fire to the room, and before the flames could be extinguished, Mr. B's most valuable manuscripts, on which he had spent the labor of years, were entirely consumed.—Alb. Journal.

Exemption of Household Furniture.—It will be seen by a reference to our Senate proceedings, that the Hon. Mr. STRONG, this morning reported a bill in conformity with the numerous petitions for an extension of the exemption of household furniture from sale under execution and distress warrants. A similar bill was before the Senate last winter, but failed for want of time to mature its provisions. We trust that this bill may meet with the favor of the Legislature, and become a law speedily. Philanthropy and humanity equally demand its passage.—Alb. Journal.

This bill is as follows:

Sec. 1. In addition to the articles now exempted by law from distress for rent, or levy and sale under execution, there shall be exempted from such distress and levy and sale, necessary household furniture and working tools owned by any person being a householder, or having a family for which he provides, to the value of not exceeding $200; provided that such exemption shall not extend to any execution issued on a demand for the purchase money of such furniture or tools.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect on the first day of May next.

Girard Trust Examination.—The committee appointed by the Legislature of Pensylvania to examine into the management of the Girard Fund, have commenced their duties in Philadelphia. From the testimony before the Committee, it appears that the style of achitecture adopted is of the most sumptuous kind. The order is called Grecian Corinthian. So far, however, as the dimensions of the main building are concerned, it is in accordance with the will of Mr. Girard. In its fire-proof character, arched in all its parts, and faced with marble and with a marble roof, and also in every other respect as it relates to a substantial and permanent building, it is consistent with the will. But the will does not mention the columns that surround the building, and they are a deviation from it. Three or four years are considered as necessary to complete the College, although the work upon it was commenced July 4th, 1833. Its splendor is unrivalled by any building in the United States, except the Capitol at Washington.

Slavery vs. the Constitution.—The following is a law of Alabama:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person to seize and make a slave for life, to his own use, and any free person of color who may have come into the State of Alabama since the year 1832; and be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for a person to seize upon and make a slave for life, any free person of color who may be found in the State of Alabama after the passage of this act, and who shall have come into the State since its passage."—Approved Feb. 2, 1839.

Constitution of the United States. Art. 4, Sec. 2.—"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

It is stated that the most eminent lawyer, Francis Hargrave, amassed his extensive and valuable library merely by picking up at book-stalls. It was so valuable that it was purchased by the British Museum, towards which Parliament granted $800.

Steamboat Explosion and loss of life.—The Mobile Morning Herald of the 4th inst. says,—By the arrival of the steamer Canebrake, from Logan's Bluff last evening, we have received the confirmation of the rumor brought us yesterday morning of an explosion of the boilers of the steamer North Star, and the fatal loss of life attendant on it. The occurrence took place at about 10 or 12 miles below Tuscaloosa, on her passage down, on the 2[illegible] ult. After the explosion, the boat took fire and burnt to the waters edge and sunk. Fifteen persons are said to have been killed, among whom are Col C. D. Conner, of Marengo and a Mr. Tannahill of Tuscaloosa county, passengers; both of the engineers, one of the pilots, the bar keeper and several other firemen and deck hands. The Captain, J. Parham, and the pilot, were both blown into the river, but succeeded in reaching the shore—the latter severely injured.

Beet Sugar.—Belgium makes sixteen million pounds—half her consumption of the article; the German Union, thirty millions pounds—a third of its consumption; Austria the same, but consumes one hundred and ten millions of foreign sugar. Chevalier estimates the total consumption of the most industrious and flourishing countries of Europe,' of Beet-root sugar, at one hundred and 76,000,000,000 pounds not a third of the whole.

The Jews in Berlin.—A reform is preparing among the Jews here, partly resembling that which has lately taken place in London; that is to say, they will divide, as it is said, into the Reformed and the Talmudists. The former reject the Talmud, to which the latter still adhere.

O'Connel is about to marry in his old age. He leads to the altar, in his sixty-eighth year, the daughter of Sir James Murray, (of Fluid Magnesia celebrity) aged ninteen. She is younger than his youngest child!

Some thousand of Roman coins were ploughed up in a stubble-field at Aberystith. They are of the reign of Julius Cæsar and his immediate successors.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

MARRIED,

In Brookfield on 24th February, by Elder S. B Crandall, Mr. SAMUEL JORDIN and Miss MARY ANN BABCOCK, all of the above place.

In Brookfield on the 13th inst., by Elder S. B. Crandall, Mr. DARIUS BURDICK and Miss MARY ANN GROVIER, all of the above place.

In Alfred, Allegany Co., on the 3d ult., by the Rev. J. R Irish, the Rev. JAMES H. COCHRAN and ARMINDA MAXSON, daughter of Luke Maxson jr. Esq.

DIED,

In Otselic on the 15th inst., Mr. WALTER R. LEVISEE, after a distressing illness of typhus fever, in the 50th year of his age. He has left a disconsolate widow and six children to mourn their loss. He has for a long time been an influential member of the Baptist Church in that place.

In Otselic on the 20th inst., JAMES, son of Erastus and Mary Miller, aged 8 years—of scarlet fever.

At Berlin, on the 6th instant, Mrs. BURDICK, relict of Gardner Burdick. Aged 81 years.

In Brookfield, on the 12th inst., CORNELIA, daughter of Jonathan Babcock, in the 19th year of her age. Sister Babcock had entertained a hope for some 4 or 5 years, but had never united herself with the visible church of Christ, but we humbly trust she is now united with the Church triumphant.—She manifested in her last hours that the hope she had was like an anchor to the soul.

OBITUARY.

NANCY ELLIS, the subject of this memoir, was born in the state of Massachusetts. While still young she was made the subject of saving grace, was baptised and united with the Baptist Church. She subsequently removed with her youthful husband to the town of Smyrna, in the County of Chenango, New York. She united with the Baptist Church in Smyrna, of which she remained a faithful member till a few years before her death. She removed her standing to the Baptist Church in Lincklaen, of which she remained a member until her death.—She became the mother of twelve children, three of whom she buried; as a wife she was lovely, and the solace of her husband; as a mother she was faithful and affectionate; as a neighbor she was kind and benevolent; as a christian she was truly exemplary, being faithful in all her house. She possessed a strong, healthy constitution, was scarcely ever sick. Two weeks before her death, she was attacked with a numbedness in her left side, which rapidly increased till Friday, the 11th March, at 7 o'clock P. M. she died, being 62 years of age. The morning before she died, she said she was clothed with the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, and knew no reason why she should not be willing to depart. She retained her senses to the last. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51:12

UNITED STATES'
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.
CAPITAL,
ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!
Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.
CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,
COMBINING
FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE.
SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

POETRY.

Our Own Fireside.

BY JOHN CLARKE.

Our fireside's easy chair—
Is there any place beside
Where such pleasant cheer we share?
Where the hours so gently glide?
Though but humble be the fare
That want's daily toils provide,
Dainty's cup can ne'er compare
With the joy that sparkles there,
By our own fire-side.

Would you meet with genuine Mirth
Where she comes a willing guest?
'Tis the quiet, social hearth,
Well I wot, she loveth best;
Where the little ones, at play,
Prattle by their mother's side,
And the elder, mildly gay,
Laugh and sing the hours away.

An honest man, though poor,
Yet may feel an honest pride
While he tells his troubles o'er
Where his heart hath nought to hide.
He who falls from high estate
No great grievance hath to hide,
If he calmly meets his fate,
Where Content and Quiet wait
By the rustic fire-side.

They who love us till we die,
Who through troubles have been tried,
Who will watch the closing eye
When all grows cold beside—
Where shall friends like these be found,
Search we earth and ocean wide?
Where, on all this weary round,
Save that hallowed spot of ground
Called our own fire-side?

In my chimney's cozy nook
Thus I chant my rustic lay;
Neath the rafters, brown with smoke
Curling up for many a day.
Wealth may boast his splendid hall,
Pomp and luxury and pride,
Sculptured roof and pictured wall—
There's no comfort in them all
Like my own fire side.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A LIFE OF AMUSEMENT AND A LIFE OF PRAYER.

Perhaps no persons have better opportunity to ascertain the true condition and feelings of the dying, than the observing Christian physician.

In the possession of health, surrounded by the enchantments of life, and while the heart is young and buoyant, the sober and truly awful realities of a dying moment are passed lightly over, or are wholly neglected. Not so is it, however, when disease spreads its sombre wings and bears its victims onward toward the dark tomb. As life is thus passing away, and the sufferer is allowed to retain "the light of reason," he is not only inclined, but forced to contemplate the prospects before him. The justice and mercy of God are soberly contrasted—the nature of the one, and the conditions of the other are scrupulously viewed—the career of life—the deathless nature of the soul—the appropriate meaning of eternity, and the judgment to come, are topics no longer shrunk from with feelings of scepticism.

"A death-bed is a detector of the heart."

Often have I seen the truth of these remarks affectingly verified in death-bed scenes. One instance I will relate.

Mary Ann was a most beautiful girl, about eighteen or nineteen years of age.—She belonged to one of the most esteemed and intelligent families. Though the general ideas of religion were slightly impressed upon her mind, so that she gave them a passing assent, yet, unfortunately for her, she had always been taught that many of the fashionable amusements which the more devoted portion of the church rejected, might not only be tolerated, but it was our privilege to enjoy them. What engaged her attention more particularly, was dancing. A practice which, we may justly regret, by certain classes of professors of religion is openly advocated, much to the dishonor and injury of religion itself.

Although the subject of these remarks was by nature possessed of a most amiable disposition, mild and docile, and had enjoyed all the advantages of a rare education; yet, with these also, she had been taught that dancing was an important branch of female education. This "amusement" she was first taught, then loved; and, consequently, amidst whatever duties or circumstances she was placed, she perseveringly practised.

I well remember the time when many of the youth of her neighborhood were deeply impressed with divine things, and she herself was quite serious; on being asked why she did not embrace so favorable an opportunity to dedicate her soul to the great Redeemer, her reply was, to me, most alarming. I discovered in it what was likely to prove her ruin, for she was cherishing desires and habits which she had received, side by side, with every other kind of instruction, scholastic, domestic and religious. "How can I think," said she, "of becoming pious, when, in doing so, I shall debar myself of the privilege of [illegible] balls? Our minister says dancing is wrong. If the Rev. Mr. —— was [illegible], I think I would venture to be [illegible], for he allows this innocent amusement." It was in vain that I tried to [illegible] of this delusion, and solemnly [illegible] that she would yet see the [illegible] between a life of amusement and [illegible]. She listened respectfully [illegible] without a tear, but clung still to her favorite amusement. Ah, said I, as I turned away, could this Rev. Mr. —— witness the tendency of his admission in this young creature, if he is himself a child of God, he would shudder at its results.

I was intimate with her family, and knew that Mary Ann was attached to me as a friend and as a physician. But while she assented to my religious views in general, she pertinaciously adhered to the propriety of teaching, and the innocency of practising dancing; and that it was not inconsistent with the profession of religion. On one occasion, in reply, I said—allowing that this "amusement" is as innocent, or indeed the most innocent of all others, do you not always find that it leads the mind away from serious things? And if you are inclined to favor such reflections, does not this employment at once dissipate them, and bring the mind more and more into a state of indifference to religion, and to the sober cares of domestic life? After a moment's hesitancy she assented that it did. Well, continued I, how can that be innocent which does not, and can not fit you for the appropriate duties of the child, the sister, the wife, the mother, or the Christian? Can that be innocent which does no more for a diffident young lady, than a glass of wine does for a timid young man—exhilarate and embolden at first, bewilder and destroy at last?

In the whirl of popular amusements this gay creature soon forgot her serious impressions—time passed on.

I was one day summoned to the bed-side of my young friend. I found her seized with a violent attack of typhus fever, a malady which at that time was prevailing in the community. From the very first her symptoms were alarming. And though we seemed for a little while to gain a little upon the enemy, that little was soon lost by a more unyielding return of the fearful disease. Apprehending the great danger of her condition, I apprised her of my fears, and ventured to allude to the state of her soul. She was evidently much embarrassed, but finally said—"Doctor, I am too weak, and in too much pain now to converse with you, but will, by and by."—And reaching forth her trembling hand, which was met by own, she continued—"you are a friend—I know it to be so. I believe you always sought to teach me the truth. Do you remember me in your" ——. At this moment she withdrew her hand, and placing it over her eyes, wept bitterly. Remember you in my prayers, I suppose you were to say, added I. "Yes, yes, that was it. Doctor, do pray for me." And why, my child, do you wish me to pray for you now, more than formerly? She perceived the point to which I was coming, and said,—"I understand you. There is, indeed, a "difference between a life of amusement and a life of prayer"—a difference which on this sick bed I most acutely feel. Doctor, do pray for me." Her hand trembled—her eyes filled—she covered her face with her handkerchief. I felt a strange sensation in my feelings—a sensation of hope and fear, which seemed to be in contest. I was preparing to offer her counsel, but just then a message came for me to hurry to another scene of suffering.

I was absent several hours. On my return I found the arrow of disease had been aimed with unerring skill—the victim was sure. The patient had fallen into a state of stupor so fearfully ominous of the fatal termination of the typhus fever. The tongue and lips were covered with a dark tenacious fur, the speech was scarcely intelligible, and the eyes were partially closed. A sort of low murmur, or moaning was heard from her half-opened lips. Yet, when called by name, she would open her eyes, and seemed to recognize those around her. She continued in this condition for several hours, during which period she occasionally uttered the most heart-touching and unearthly groans I ever heard from a mortal being. They distressed me—they distressed us all.

At last, putting my mouth to her ear, I said—Mary Ann, do tell me what mean these unearthly groans which we hear from you?—What is the matter, my dear child? If it is in your power to tell me, do, I beseech you. And never shall I forget the reply. She opened her once beautiful eyes, slowly raised her pale and attenuated hand, and fixing on me a look that made my very soul ache, such was its solemn intensity, she said with an audibleness of her voice that utterly astonished us all,

"Doctor, Doctor, there is a difference between a life of amusement and a life of prayer. O! it is hard to die without an interest in Christ."

She closed her eyes, her hand fell, and all was silent. And, my soul, what a silence was that! Soon the earthly anguish of the sufferer was ended—she spoke not again.

I looked around me with feelings which I cannot describe. I saw the mother who professed a regard for religion, it is true, but who had always joined the daughter in saying, "dancing is an innocent amusement, and a very great accomplishment to a young lady." There, too, was the father, who had been led along by the erring judgment of the wife on whose love he doted. I saw brothers, who, through life, thus far, had lived gaily and thoughtlessly; I saw companions dressed in youth's fresh glow, who had walked arm and arm in the deceitful way which had just conveyed the once attractive Mary Ann into the awful chamber of a just and stern eternity. I saw professors of the holy religion of the Son of God, whose present career partook more of the spirit of this world, than of the next; and, thought I, can these ever cease to remember this dying scene, and the testimony of such a witness?

"There is a difference between a life of amusement and a life of prayer. It is hard to die without an interest in Christ."

From the Madison Observer.

OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Having visited the schools of the towns of Eaton, Nelson, De Ruyter, Georgetown, Lebanon, Hamilton, and partially of Brookfield and Madison, I think proper to lay before the public the results of my observations and investigations.

I have found almost every variety of schools—good, bad, and indifferent,—too many of the latter class. The causes of the present depressed conditions of many of them, are various: some of the most prominent are pointed out.

Of about one hundred school-houses which I have visited, twenty-eight only can be rendered comfortable in cold weather; two-thirds of them have no external conveniences whatever, and none in which the physical comfort and ease of the scholars are consulted as much as in our poorest churches. Examine them under the most favorable circumstances, and they exhibit but a dreary spectacle; yet, parents expect their children will delight in frequenting these uncouth and uncomfortable structures. If this is the case, they manifest a taste surely not hereditary, for it is the exact opposite of parental inclinations generally. Another obstacle is, public apathy upon the subject. All admit that our schools are not right, that something is wanted to elevate their character, and extend their usefulness. I am often solicited to recommend some measure for improving them; yet, when I have suggested the propriety of making some little alterations in the internal arrangements of the house, by making backs to the seats; by altering the writing-desks, and adapting them to the different sizes of the scholars, to prevent their elbows being elevated to a level with their shoulders while writing; by preparing the room with means of ventilation by lowering the upper sash or otherwise; furnishing a black-board which will enable the teacher to illustrate a problem to twenty in the same time he can do to one without it; introducing maps of our County, State, and Union, that a knowledge of our own geographical position and relations might be inculcated, as well as universal geography; procuring an artificial globe, from which a scholar with an efficient instructor will derive more extensive knowledge of the shape and motions of the earth, and the relative position and situation of the different countries upon its surface in the space of one week, than in five years in the common way; I have been told that my suggestions were very good; that all these things were necessary; but, at present "hard times" prevailed. A few patriotic individuals have expressed their willingness to contribute their share to procure an apparatus; yet, in almost every district are persons who will not contribute one fraction more than the law compels for the public good. Consequently, I have become wearied with appealing to men's pockets, as that appears to be the most sensitive part of their precious persons.

Another obstacle is, the multiplicity of text-books. In most cases, the fruits of the extraordinary labors of cheap teachers, who, having a partial knowledge of but one author, and none of general principles, must introduce his work, otherwise their most invaluable services will be lost. This difficulty will be partially remedied in the course of the present year.

The last, and by no means the least, impediment to the improvement of our schools which I shall here notice, is, the unsuitableness of many of our teachers for the station they occupy. There are exceptions, honorable exceptions, to this remark; but they are like angels' visits, "few and far between." The usual failings are, a lack of ability to impart, communicate, and illustrate ideas and instructions; a want of judgment, common sense, and a sufficient knowledge of human nature to enable them to manage or govern a school. To effect a reform in this department, I invite the attention of the Town Inspectors. They are the chosen instruments to ascertain the competency of teachers. They are required to certify conscientiously that they believe the applicant well qualified, in respect to moral character, learning, and ability, to instruct a common school. The general rules which have governed inspectors in discharging their duties, are to presume the moral character to be good until proved to the contrary, to ascertain the learning by investigation, and to let the third and most important legal requisition pass unquestioned and unnoticed. Hence, the failures in this particular. Allow me to make a few suggestions for their consideration. Would it not be proper to require of strangers, written testimonials of moral character? I find that several schools have been closed during the past season on account of the immorality of the instructors. In investigating the extent of the applicant's learning, criticise them thoroughly upon the first rudiments, the elementary principles of the common branches. This has been very much neglected, especially with the teachers of our summer schools, which should not be, as they are required to form the basis on which to rear the superstructure of knowledge, & make the first impressions upon the young and pliant mind. If not versed in the subjects to be taught, false impressions will be conveyed; for we cannot expect a person to teach that which they do not know. Ascertain not only their knowledge of the branches commonly taught, but their general information upon other subjects, as this will assist you in judging of their ability to impart, communicate, and illustrate ideas, and their competency to manage and govern schools. Their age should also be considered. It is not to be expected that the little boy or girl, green in years, and still greener in judgment, can manage a common school; for extensive observation, mature judgment, and a thorough knowledge of human nature are essential qualifications for all engaged in the instruction of youth.

These suggestions attended to, and our schools will improve. Let every man, every parent, every teacher, and every officer, act well his part, and soon the entire aspect of our schools will be changed.—They will approximate to the standard of excellence so ardently desired by all. In them the youth of our beautiful Republic will receive knowledge which will enable them to transact business with facility in all the common avocations of life. In them they will be educated like freemen—"fit to govern or to obey." God, speed the day.

EDWARD MANCHESTER,
Dep'y Sup'nt of Com. Schools.

THE USHER AND THE VICE PRESIDENT.—When about eighteen years of age, Mr. S. was an usher in the academy at Mendham, N. J., at which the Editor of the Republican, then a small boy, was a student. Like most of his school fellows, his head was fuller of frolic than of study, and his proneness to mischief frequently exposed him to the ferula, which the principal, the reverend and truly pious Dr. Armstrong, used with an unsparing hand. The arrival of Mr. S. was a happy event. His disposition seemed conciliating, and the students hoped to transgress with impunity. They were, however, soon undeceived, for the birch was added to the ferula, and on one occasion the Editor of the Republican was brought up. It was his first offense, and the manner of the usher denoted a summary punishment. "Take off your coat," was the first salutation. How he performed this ceremony, those only can know who have tried it. However, at last the coat was off, "Stand up here, that I may give it you fairly." These were the very words. It was an anxious suspense.

On one side were the eyes of thirty or forty of his play-fellows, ready to witness his shame. On the other, the uplifted rod of the vindictive usher. It was torture.—The arm moved. He imagined the blow already struck on his back. No. It fell harmless at his side; and with a cool, "Take your seat, sir," he was dismissed! He was afterwards the best boy in the school. Had a sound whipping actually followed, it would have been regarded as a matter of course, and the circumstance long since passed into oblivion. But the manner of the usher was every thing; it could only speak for itself. The usher is now at the head of the Senate of the United States.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

ROOF'S FOUNDER OINTMENT,

For the cure of foundered horses, split-hoofs, or hoof-bound horses; also, all wounds or bruises in the flesh, galled backs, cracked heals occasioned by overreach, or tread of another horse, Scratches, &c.

For which the subscribers have been appointed sole agents for this place.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC,

FOR the cure of RING BONE, SPAVIN, WIND GALLS, &c. &c. ☞ A certain cure in all cases ☜ Many certificates can be shown, and will be if wished, to place this inestimable specific as a perfect cure, beyond a doubt.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct. Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the Lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

One of the best medicines for common colds Influenzas &c. &c. &c., to be found in the whole catalogue of patent medicines. Give it a try, it is first rate, call and read one of his circulars.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and use administered to more than 18,000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

N. B. Ask for Dr. M. Hitchcock's Worm Tea, as there are many nostrums abroad for the destruction of worms.

LOOK AT THIS.

HAVE YOU A COUGH?

70 000 DIE OF CONSUMPTION every year in the United States, and millions suffer from troublesome coughs and colds, that can be cured by Dr. Hitchcock's Vegetable Cream Cough Drops, a safe medical prescription, containing no poisonous drugs, and used in an extensive practice for several years will most positively afford relief, and save you from that awful disease, pulmonary consumption, which sweeps into the grave hundreds of the young, the old, the lovely and the gay.

Have you a cough?—Be persuaded to purchase a bottle of the Cough Drops to-day! To-morrow may be too late. Price, 75 cents per bottle.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

We also state, for the benefit of the afflicted, that we have the following valuable MEDICINES, among our large stock.

Historical Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion.

LECTURE III—THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY G. M. LANGWORTHY.

5. But not to pursue the argument of Mr. Hume any further, we may state in general terms that the objection to miracles, which has been so long insisted upon, viz: that they are opposed to the uniform course of nature, is entirely without force. They are not alledged to have taken place under the uniform operation of nature, and their being opposed to our uniform experience is no reason why we should not believe them upon sufficient testimony; the only question then to be settled is, how much and what kind of testimony, is necessary to produce conviction and establish belief of an event that is miraculous? If an event that is miraculous be ascribed to a cause insufficient to produce it, we might, perhaps, at first hesitate to believe it, but if a man should insist that it did happen, that he saw it with his own eyes, that others also who were present saw the same phenomenon, and further, if these other persons should come forward and testify to the same thing, and we could not discover any good reason why they should lie, but on the other hand could see many reasons why they should not lie, I think we should believe their statement as to the event, though we might doubt whether they had so sufficiently observed the sequence as to ascertain the true cause.

There is also another difficulty which might be attendant upon miracles, and that is, we might not see any reason why they should happen. In this case, though we might be convinced that they did take place, yet the mind would be somewhat perplexed, as it could perceive no object to be accomplished in their occurrence.

Now the miracles recorded in the New Testament are entirely free from any objections of this kind. In the first place they are ascribed to an agent, and the only agent that is competent to perform miracles, that is to the Deity; and in the second place they are alledged to have been wrought to accomplish a good and benevolent object, which object may be stated in a few words, as follows: When the Deity made man and placed him upon the earth, He also informed him of his origin and of the laws by which he must be governed, in order to retain his primeval happiness, but in process of time man became so degenerated as in a great degree to lose this happiness and involve himself in misery. The Deity, intent upon preserving the noblest work of his hand from utter destruction after a period of about 4000 years, concluded to make a fuller explanation of his will to man, and also to provide an easier mode of acceptance in His own sight, than that which the law specified. If He made such a communication it was necessary that it should be attested by such evidence as would distinguish it from any device of man, otherwise it would not be believed. This evidence was that of miracles. From this view of the subject, there is no more improbability that miracles should be wrought, than there is that the Deity should for this wise and benevolent object, make a communication of his will to man.

6. Is there then, any kind of testimony upon which we can rely with sufficient confidence to establish a conviction in the existence of miracles? When Mr. Hume tells us that testimony is liable to deceive us, he uses the term testimony in too general a sense. We acknowledge that some kinds of testimony are deceitful, but we contend that there is another kind which does not deceive us, a kind upon which we rely with as much confidence as we do upon the evidence of our own senses. Is it just to make these men, who carry every mark of candor and sincerity upon their countenance, and who are known to be men of truth; is it just, I ask, to make these men answerable for the lives of other men? With as much propriety might we say, that money is counterfeit, it is distrustful, it cannot be relied upon, because there happens to be some counterfeit money in circulation. Would any man consider it as a reason why he should condemn all money as good for nothing, because there happened to be some counterfeit? [illegible] there was [illegible] distinguished by another class of characteristics, testifies to the truth; and these marks of truth are easily enough distinguished,—1, If the subject testified of be matter of fact and not of opinion; if it be such an event as can be judged of by the senses; 2, If the witness has had sufficient opportunity of observing the event in question, and has besides common sense enough to know whether he saw the event or not; 3, If he has no worldly interest in establishing the event, except that it is what he actually saw; 4, If in consequence of his adherence to his statement he should suffer contempt, derision, scorn, persecution, distress, and even death. 5, If several individuals, between whom there was not the least evidence of collusion, or connivance, should all, in this same cool, honest, and determined manner, testify to the same event, then I apprehend that every honest man would believe the statement, whether it were miraculous or not. The second objection shall be considered in its proper place. We shall now proceed to show that all these principles of veracity are amply fulfilled in the testimony of the Evangelists and Apostles, and that consequently they are the most proper witnesses that can be brought forward to testify in this case.

1. As to the subject testified of there was no possibility of deception—the witnesses either saw and heard what they testified to, or else they told what they knew was false. If they had been with their leader on some occasion on which he had raised a man from the dead, and they had not seen the man after he was brought to life, then they could only give it as their opinion that such a thing took place, but when they state in an unhesitating manner, that the deaf was made to hear, the dumb to speak, and that the dead were raised by the word of their master—that these persons were afterwards seen, conversed with, and handled, there remains no longer a possibility of their being deceived on this subject—it becomes a matter of fact, they knew whether or not such things took place.

2. There were no men in the world who had from their situation so fair an opportunity of knowing what were the miracles and sayings of Christ as these men. Matthew was an original apostle and emissary of the religion. Mark was an inhabitant of Jerusalem at the time, to whose house the apostles often resorted, and besides he was an attendant upon one of the most eminent of the number. Luke was a stated companion of the most active of all the teachers of the religion, and in consequence of his travels frequently in the society of the original apostles. John, like Matthew, was one of the Apostles.

No stronger evidence of the truth of a history can arise from the situation of the historian, than what is here afforded. The authors of all the histories lived at the time and upon the spot. Two of them were present at many of the scenes which they describe, eye witnesses of the facts, ear witnesses of the discourses; writing from personal knowledge and recollection, and, what strengthens their testimony, writing upon a subject in which their minds were deeply engaged, and in which as they must have been very frequently repeating the accounts to others, the passages of the history would be kept continually alive in their memory.

Whoever reads the gospel will find in them not merely a general affirmation of miraculous power, but detailed, circumstantial accounts of miracles, with specifications of times, places, and persons. In the gospels, therefore, of Matthew and John, these narratives must either be true, as far as the fidelity of human recollection is to be depended upon, that is, must be true in substance, and in their principal parts, (which is sufficient for proving a supernatual agency,) or they must be willful and meditated falsehoods. Yet the authors of these falsehoods, if they are such, were the very persons who sacrificed their ease and safety in the cause, and for a purpose the most inconsistent with dishonest motives. They were villians for no end but to teach honesty, and martyrs without the least prospect of honor or advantage. The gospels of Mark and Luke, although not the narratives of eye-witnesses, are the writings of contemporary historians, one of whom lived in the place which was the principal scene of action, and both lived in habits of society and correspondence with those who had been present at the transactions which they relate. Luke tells us, (and with [illegible] because he tells it with- [illegible] source; and that he was prepared to instruct his reader in the certainty of the things which he related. Few historians are so closely connected with the subject and facts of their narrative, or possess such means of authentic information as these.

3. We come now to speak of the disinterestedness of the witnesses, in which we shall attempt to answer the second objection stated at the commencement of our investigation. If the objector means that the original witnesses were interested in establishing the truth, that the actual events which transpired in Palestine and its environs under the superhuman agency of Christ, made such a deep and lasting impression upon their minds, that they were induced to write them in books. If this is the interest which is attributed to them, then we admit the charge. But if, by interestedness, he means to insinuate that the first propagators of the gospels were interested in establishing a lie, then we call upon him, under this supposition to account for the conduct of these men, or at least to answer the following question. Is it possible that men in their senses, possessed of their reason, should voluntarily expose themselves to hardships, sufferings, stripes, imprisonments, scoffs, ridicule, and even death, for the purpose of establishing a lie, which promised no hope of honor or advantage, either in this world or in that which is to come? For it must not be forgotten that if the original witnesses testified to what they knew to be false, (and if it was false they did know it,) they could have no hope of a future reward, for such daring imposition, such strange inconsistency of conduct. But we do not rest the objection here,—we say that there are, in the compositions of these men, those natural signs of honesty, candor, and, (in the last sense) disinterestedness, which are to be found only in true histories. The novelist never fails to notice every circumstance, however trivial, which seems necessary to complete the picture in its most imposing style. He never states, in round, unvarnished words, the most important facts connected with any transaction, and then passes on to something else, leaving some things of interest and curiosity in the dark. This only is the part of the true historian; he seizes the facts as they present themselves, frequently forgetting the order of time, and intent only on placing the true transactions before the reader.

PRICE OF THE SOUL.

The worth of the soul may be argued from the price which has been paid for its redemption. I have already intimated that the soul of man is not now the being it once was. God created man upright and perfect; but by transgression he fell—the crown tumbled from his head, and his honor lies in the dust—the soul is loaded with guilt and blackened with crimes; and man cannot redeem his own soul. The redemption of the soul was too precious for man to effect—the price required was too great, and no created being could redeem it. Our poet of Paradise has, indeed, supposed a case—and it may pass for poetry, but, depend upon it, it is not theology. He absolutely supposes the Divine Being instituting an inquiry among the angelic orders:

> "Say, heavenly powers! where shall we find such love?
> Which of ye will be mortal to redeem
> Man's mortal crime, the just the unjust to save?
> Dwells in all heaven charity so dear?
> He asked; but all the heavenly choir stood mute,
> And silence was in heaven."

What, then, did the poet Milton imagine, that if Gabriel had said, "Lo here am I, send me; I am willing for the sake of man, to assume his nature and live, and suffer and die, "the just the unjust to save!"—did the poet imagine that the death of Gabriel in a human body would have effected the redemption of the soul of man? The thing was impossible. No mere creature could have effected the redemption of the sons of myriads of men. Man was redeemed, but for what? Let St Peter tell. We were "not redeemed with corruptible things as silver and gold"—no, no, there had been no proportion between the worth of that to be redeemed and the price in that case—"not with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without spot!" A price it is, O how precious! Who can conceive the preciousness of the blood of Christ? A price beyond all power of angels and of men to compute!

If the sum paid down was so incalculably great, what, in the estimation of the Divine Being, must have been the worth of the soul which was redeemed by such a price? But, then, that this redemption might be carried into practical effect, what a wonderful diversity of means has God employed! For this he has given us the word of his truth—for this he has sent down the Spirit of his grace—for this he has appointed the holy Sabbath [illegible] service of the [illegible] commissioned his [illegible] that he has given us line upon line and precept upon precept—for this the spirit strives—for this the ordinance of his grace is dispensed—for this the successive seasons revolve—for this the sun gives his light—for this the willing earth continues her increase—and for this time is continued, and human life is prolonged and death is delayed: all this that the soul may be saved! O man, O woman, reverence thyself! Thou hast a soul—a soul whose interests are immeasurable, whose worth is incalculable—reverence thyself! And, secondly, tremble for thyself; for invaluable as is thy soul, it may by possibility be lost?—Now, when our Lord speaks of the loss of the soul, he does not speak of its existence, but the loss of its well being, the loss of all that for which it would be desirable to save a soul. To be lost is to be cast away; to be undone is to perish.

"DEATH, WHERE IS THY STING?"

To the infidel and the impenitent man, death is full of stings. They can never think of it without a gloom. To them it is the most unpleasant of all subjects. They keep it out of mind as much as possible, and when it is forced upon them by witnessing the death of others, or by their own dissolution, it fills them with agony. The death of the wretched Altamont, as described by Dr. Young, is only a fair specimen of the feelings of every impenitent man, who has any realizing sense of his condition, on the death-bed. Were it not that disease and the stupefying effects of medicine prevent, the wakeful agony of an Altamont would attend every enemy of God in that hour. Said one, 'My soul lies broad awake to agony;' and so all persons similarly situated would say, if they were not generally rendered stupid by other causes. But stupid indifference is far enough from active submission. And the Christian who knows that he is drawing near the grave, and rejoices in God in the prospect, is not to be compared with the sinner who passes out of the world in sluggish indifference.

Paul closes his masterly argument for the resurrection of the dead with the triumphant questions, 'O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?'—To the Christian death has no sting.—'The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.' This was the feeling of Paul. And this is the feeling of all from whom the sting of death has been taken away. 'Death is swallowed up in victory'—victory over all corruption.—Oberlin Evangelist.

DISEASES OF THE SOUL.

First, ignorance, that in so thick a mist of errors and sects, we know not how to find out the truth; and that which tops our folly is, that we are grown too wise in our own conceits. Second, concupiscence, that pestilence of the soul, whose cankered blossoms are still sprouting up in the most regenerate hearts; this weakened the power of Sampson, infatuated the wisdom of Solomon, defiled the holiness of David. Third, self-love, an hidden poison, the rust of the mind, the moth of holiness, the parent of envy, the original of all vices.—Fourth, discontent, which makes us prize what we want, slight what we enjoy, more sensible of sufferings than of blessings; like little children which, for want of some toy which they affect, throw away all they have, and fall a crying; we follow contentment hard, but as fools do an ignis fatuus, always at a distance. Fifth, preposterous fear; if we do ill, we fear magistrates; if we do well, we fear detractors; if we be rich, we fear thieves; if poor, creditors; if we hate, we fear enemies; if we love, corivals. Sixth, distrust; we all say we trust God, but, for the most part sooner with our souls than with our estates, and hardly without a pawn, as usurers would trust a bankrupt. Lastly, hypocrisy; if there be a mote in the eye, there is a beam in the heart; if there be a beam in the eye, there is a stack of mischief in the heart. We look one way, and row another way; blow hot and cold with the same mouth; and have our hearts more double than our breath. We flatter for advantage, and we slander for advantage; we serve God for advantage, and, if need be, we serve the devil for advantage. Then, since we have all made shipwreck of baptismal grace by sin; since all, without exception, do stand in need of a second plank to save them from drowning; it remains that we make choice of one of the two presented to us—dissimulation or conversation; covering or confessing—"He that covereth his sins shall not prosper; but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy."—Archbishop Bramhall.

THE LORD IS AT HAND.—The day of the Lord is near at hand to each individual, inasmuch as every man is in hourly danger of death. We must die soon; we may die in a day, or an hour, nay, the very next moment. And as soon as we shall have died, we shall be beyond the use of all means of changing our own moral character and destiny, or those of others. We shall be summoned before God—we shall enter upon endless bliss or wo. Whatever we do, must, therefore, be done quickly—how quickly we cannot tell. And is there no awakening power in such a thought?—Can the advent of the latter day be so certainly near as the day of our death, or involve more imperative reasons for our doing with all our might, whatever our hands find to do for the Lord and for perishing sinners.

The day of doom to the impenitent is at hand. Look, Christian and Christian minister, upon your neighbor's face. That soul, now beaming from those eyes in hope may be to-morrow in despair. All its preparation for eternity must be made in a period indefinitely short. To him a judgment day, which shall effectually close his probation, is unquestionably near! And is there nothing in this known truth to enkindle compassion and arouse to effort?

Again, the crisis of our country's fate is at hand. The day of our merciful visitation is fast passing away. Infidelity and Popery are taking rank root in our soil, and are cultured by many a laborer from the old world. Who can contemplate the elements of political, mercantile, and social commotion, already beginning to heave and rock the ground on which we dwell, without apprehending the approaching earthquake. "What thou doest, do quickly," then, for saving the land in which we dwell from the double wo of being accursed itself, and a curse to other nations over whom it may wield an influence.—H. Missionary.

THOUGHTS FOR THE AFFLICTED.—My afflictions are fewer than my sins, and lighter than my deserts.

My afflictions are as much the fruit of God's love as any of the bounties of his providence.

It gives no pleasure to God to see me suffer." He doth not afflict willingly." If I am in heaviness there is a need for it.

Better people than I have had as sore trials, yet uttered no complaints.

Some things in the work of sanctification cannot ordinarily be attained without sorrow.

If I know nothing of the pains of earth, I shall hardly be well prepared for the joys of heaven.

There are few darker signs in the history of any professor of religion than freedom from affliction.

No one now in heaven regrets having gone there through great tribulation.

Children's Department.

FIRST RELIGIOUS LESSONS.

FOR YOUNG MOTHERS.—BY ABBOTT.

By a first religious lesson, we mean, the parent's first attempt to make a religious impression upon the intellect and heart of a child. It is the most interesting experiment on mind which can be made.

Parents very often confine the early religious instruction of their children to teaching them hymns and answers to questions. This is done in many cases before the child can articulate easily, and is in fact only a lesson in articulation. The mother so considers it. The child so considers it.—He regards it merely as an effort on his part, to remember and pronounce certain words. It is useful, notwithstanding. It exercises and improves both the memory and the organs of speech. But it is not religious instruction.

If religious truth is brought before the child, with a proper regard to his capacity and to his previous knowledge, and if it is brought before him with a design that he shall really understand and feel it, it will make a strong impression. In fact, the time most favorable for making a strong religious impression on the human heart, is when the principles of Christianity are first announced, provided that it is done in such a manner as to be really an announcement to the intellect and heart, and not merely to the ear. The following [illegible] which we have good authority [illegible] occurred exactly as it is here [illegible] lustrates this, and shows [illegible] attempting really to reach [illegible] child, and not merely his [illegible] early religious instruction.

Little Samuel had just [illegible] His father had said nothing to [illegible] his obligations to any higher power than his earthly parents—having been waiting for him to acquire such maturity of mind, and command of language, as should enable him to understand and feel the existence of God when it should first be declared. The time had now arrived.

One evening, when he had gone to bed, his father determined to employ the few minutes which would intervene before he would be asleep, to convey to his mind his first notion of the unseen Jehovah. He leaned over him on his pillow, and the following dialogue ensued:

'Samuel,' said his father, 'who is here?'

'Who is here besides Samuel?' asked the child, as if he did not fully understand the question.

Father. Yes.

Samuel. Papa and Mamma.

'Who else is here?' said his father, intending first to excite his attention to the question of persons present and absent.

Samuel raised his head and looked around the room, and then said,

'Mary is out—away.'

F. Yes, but who is here?

'Besides the room where Samuel is?' asked he, looking around in vain for any other person.

After a momentary pause, the father added in a serious voice:

'God is here.'

S. Heh?

The exclamation was in the tone of a robin; it cannot be spelled.

F. God is here.

S. Is he? in a tone of surprise.

F. Yes, he is here.

S. Let me see him. And he started up from his pillow, and looked eagerly around.

F. No, you can't see him,

S. Is he out this way? eagerly pointing.

F. No, you cannot see him, I say.

S. Is he out that way?

F. No, you cannot see him any where.

S. Is he out that way? [Very eagerly.] Let me get up—I can see it.

'No,' said the father, calmly, 'you can not see him any where. Papa cannot see him. Mamma cannot see him. Nobody can see him.'

S. All body—all folks can't see him?

It was with great difficulty that he could be satisfied that he could not see God. He wanted to get up and look around, and he gazed, with great earnestness, into every part of the room, which was but feebly lighted by a single dimly burning lamp.

Presently he lay down, and there was a pause.

'God can see Samuel,' said his father, 'though you cannot see him.'

S. Heh?

F. Yes, he sees you. When you are naughty God sees you, and when you are good he sees you.

The child did not answer. He seemed lost in thought.

'God is all about us,' continued his father, 'every where. He is down stairs and up stairs, and out in the street, and every where.'

S. Can Mary see him?

F. No, nobody can see him.

He lay still for a moment, apparently thinking with interest and pleasure, of what he had learned. At last he said in a subdued and gentle tone,

'I like God.'

He probably merely meant by this, that he was interested in the new idea thus presented to his mind.

After a little more conversation, he was left for the night, and a few minutes afterwards, some one passing by his door, heard his voice. He was half singing, half talking himself to sleep.

'Dum, dum, dum—Pa' can't see him, Ma' can't see him; dum, dum, dum—God can see me, dum, dum, dum.'

Although such a mind could of course but faintly appreciate the sublime conception of an invisible but omnipresent Deity, the lesson had evidently made its way to the understanding and the heart.

I MAY THANK YOU FOR IT.

"One day," says Mr. Robert Raikes of Gloucester, the institutor of Sunday-schools, "I overtook a soldier just entering the church door. This was on a week day. As I passed him, I said, it gave me great pleasure to see that he was going to a place of divine worship. "Ah, sir," said he, "I may thank you for that." "Me?" said I, "why I do not know that I ever say you before." "Sir," said he, "when I was a little boy, I was indebted to you for my first instruction in my duty. I used to meet you at the morning service in this cathedral, and was one of your Sunday-scholars. My father when he left this city took me into Berkshire, and put me apprentice to a shoemaker. I used often to think of you. At length I went to London, and was there drawn to serve as a militiaman, in the Westminster militia. I came to Gloucester last night with a deserter, and I took the opportunity of coming this morning to visit the old spot, and in the hope of once more seeing you." He then told me his name, and brought himself to my recollection by a curious circumstance which happened while he was at school. His father was a journeyman currier, a most vile, profligate man. After the boy had been some time at school, he came one day, and told me that his father was wonderfully changed—that he had left off going to the ale-house on Sunday. It happened some time after, that I met the man in the street, and said to him, "My friend, it gives me great pleasure that you have left off going to the ale-house on Sunday. Your boy tells me that you now stay at home, and never get tipsy." "Sir," said he, "I may thank you for it." "Nay," said I, "that is impossible: I do not recollect that I ever spoke to you before." "No sir," said he, "but the good instruction you give my boy he brings home to me, and it is that, sir, which has induced me to reform my life."

From the N. Y. Observer.

PRAYING MOTHERS.

From my earliest infancy I was blessed with Christian parents, who not only taught me to pray for myself, but prayed with me themselves. So long ago as I recollect any thing, I well remember my mother taking me with her very often into her closet and there supplicating with fervor at the throne of grace for God's blessing upon her dear children. One day, when I knew she was alone in her room, I crept softly to the door and listened at the key hole. She was praying for me—that I might early be led to embrace the Saviour and choose that better part which could never be taken from me. The thought that she was praying for me, affected me at first, but the impression soon wore off, and I cannot say that these things made any change in my conduct or feelings at the time. But in after years, when I had quitted the parental roof and entered into the busy world, I used often to recall these scenes, and to imagine my dear mother, even then, prostrate before the throne of grace, entreating a blessing upon her offspring. At length I began really to pray for myself; for how, thought I, can I escape if I neglect so great salvation. If all these petitions to God have been put up for me in vain—if I perish, how great will be my condemnation!

But God, as I humbly trust, revealed himself to me as a God who hears and answers prayer, and I shall never cease to bless his holy name for giving me pious and praying parents. My beloved mother is still alive. She has seven children also living—all of whom have arrived at mature years, and all of them are professing the name of Christ, before men. Christian mothers cease not to pray—God's promises are sure.

"Tho' seed lie buried long in dust,
It sha'nt deceive your hope,
The precious grain shall ne'er be lost,
For grace insures the crop."

A Misapprehension.

The obituary notice of Russel Green, which we publish this week would have been published before if it had been received. We understand that we were requested, through the "Sackets Harbor Journal," to give it an insertion. The "Journal," containing said request, either failed of reaching us, as it frequently does, or the notice escaped our attention. We never "refused" to publish it.

Temperance Mass Meeting.

The Total Abstinence Society of this place have resolved to celebrate the 5th of April, (Tuesday,) the anniversary of the Baltimore Reform. A Committee has been appointed to make arrangements for the occasion. Mr. CARPENTER, a reformed inebriate from Cincinnatus, will address the audience. After the exercises at the Church, refreshments will be served at the Temperance House of Martin Spear.—Citizens all around are invited to come and see, and help.

Carelessness.

A Post Master writes that papers sent back are not discontinued. The reason is, he did not do his duty in naming the office from which they were returned. On our list, we have subscribers of the same name in different places, and we cannot tell from what offices papers are returned unless the office is mentioned. In all places where papers are returned to be discontinued, we discontinue if the post office address is given, or known; if not, we continue them and shall expect pay. We hope this second notice will be sufficient.

Back Numbers.

We are not able to furnish all our new subscribers the back numbers. Our subscription list has increased since the commencement of the volume so that we are out of the first numbers. We will do the best we can.

The Methodist Reformer.

The Reformer, published at Fayettville, is suspended for the present for want of action on the part of its friends. There is a sufficient amount due the establishment to free it from debt. It is a spirited sheet, well deserving the patronage of the Reformed Methodist. We hope this light may not go out for want of support.

Extract of a Letter from Eld. A. Campbell, dated, Jewett City, March 23.

Br. Bailey,—I am now about twenty miles from home, laboring for the salvation of perishing souls, and feel that I am almost worn out and used up.

I labored last week in Portersville and preached most of the time twice a day, but am now preaching but once a day.

• • • • •

Should I attend to half the calls from Baptist Churches within thirty miles round, I should not be able to preach at home at all. I am in a revival scene almost all the while.

Fire.—The house of J. P. Livermore, of Independence, N. Y., was consumed on the 7th ult. Loss $800.

We omit our usual quantity of Editorial this week, to make room for the favors of our correspondents. Some articles which we had prepared, lie over till next week.

Revival in Truxton.

The Seventh-day Baptist Church in Truxton has enjoyed for a short time past a refreshing season from the presence of the Lord; during which time, saints have been revived, backsliders reclaimed, and sinners converted. I have baptized nine individuals since the work commenced, and there are others still lingering about the skirts of Zion, whom we hope to see come forward soon, and follow their Lord in the holy ordinance of Baptism.

The cause of the Sabbath is a subject of considerable interest with us. Two families have recently embraced the Sabbath of the fourth command; and others are searching the scriptures in regard to this subject, who tell us that they intend to have a "thus saith the Lord" for what they [illegible] practice in the future. If they pursue this course with the same fixed determination, we are not at a loss what the result of their labors will be. Oh! that the mist of error and superstition which has so long overspread christendom, might be dispersed, and men might see light in the light of God's truth.

R. G. BURDICK.

For the Register.

Br. Bailey—I submit the following remarks upon the phrase, miaton sabbaton, in John xx. 19, Matt. xxviii. 1, Luke xxiv. 1, Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2. These passages perpetually coming up in the sabbath controversy, it is important to have their meaning settled. My remarks are in defense of the common version, first day of the week.

It is contended by some of our brethren, that the proper translation is, one of the Sabbaths. I admit that this is rigidly literal: but, notwithstanding this, and notwithstanding the ability with which it has been defended, I am not satisfied with it. Their objection to the common rendering is grounded on the ordinary meaning of the word sabbaton, and on the use of the cardinal word mia, rather than the ordinal, prote. They maintain that mia and prote are never used interchangeably. That they are not ordinarily so used, is freely admitted; but whether the instances cited above are to be considered as departures from the ordinary acception, we will inquire.

Two important facts seem to bear upon the solution of this matter. 1. That while the language of the New Testament is Greek, the idiom is essentially Hebrew. The authors were Hebrews, and, therefore, the Hebrew manner of thought and expression would naturally be exhibited in their writings. 2. That the ordinary language spoken in Judea in the time of Christ and his Apostles, was the Syro-chaldaic, or a dialect formed by the blending together of the Chaldaic and Syrian, retaining at the same time much of the old Hebrew idiom. Now if the Hebrew idiom prevails throughout the New Testament, we might expect it would obtain in all those places which designate the days of the week.—Those who are learned in the Hebrew inform us, that in the account of creation, we read in the original, "the evening and the morning were one day—two day—three day," &c. It is also said, that the Septuagint retains it in the first, calling it emera mia. If such was the manner of expression in reference to the original designation of the days of the week, what wonder is it if the same manner of expression should be always employed, when the week is alluded to? If it was the Hebrew idiom to designate the days of the week thus, (and from the evidence before me I presume it was,) it is not only nothing surprising to find it used in the New Testament, but it would be surprising if it were departed from. The influence, therefore, is that in the passages above cited mia is rightly translated first.

In regard to the word sabbaton, its ordinary meaning is doubtless Sabbath. But that it may also signify week is proved, I think, from Luke xviii. 12. It is true, some suppose that this passage may mean nothing more than that the Pharisee abstained from two meals on the Sabbath. But this idea is utterly forbidden by the known practice of the Jews, who considered it sin to fast on that day. Dr. Gill, in loco, quotes Maimonides to prove "that the Sabbath was not a fasting, but a feasting day with the Jews; for they were obliged to eat three meals or feasts on a Sabbath day, one in the morning, another at evening, and another at the time of meat offering: even the poorest man in Israel, who was maintained by alms, was obliged to keep these three feasts." The same statement is made by other commentators. Since, therefore, the Pharisee could not be supposed to fast on the Sabbath, the word must of necessity be rendered week. What confirms the common rendering of this passage is the known practice of the Jews, as attested by all writers, of fasting on the second and fifth days of the week.

As the common language spoken in Judea when the New Testament was written, possessed a strong affinity to the Syriac, it would be nothing surprising to find Syriac phrases and words occasionally introduced by the sacred authors. Antiquarians have furnished us with an old Syriac calendar, which expresses the days of the week in the following manner.

One of the Sabbath.
Two of the Sabbath.
Three of the Sabbath.
Four of the Sabbath.
Five of the Sabbath.
Eve of the Sabbath.
Sabbath.

This calender is very ancient, and the presumption is that it was in common use with the people. Indeed, Dr. Gill quotes the express words of Jewish writers, to prove that they themselves were in the habit of so naming the days of the week. If this was the common mode of expression that obtained in Judea, and if it accords with the Hebrew idiom, which every where prevails in the New Testament, I think there is strong ground for concluding that the phrase mia ton sabbaton is rightly translated "first day of the week."

Whether those who propose to translate the phrase, one of the Sabbaths, have duly considered the peculiar idiom of the New Testament, and have nevertheless considered there is sufficient reason to reject the common translation, it is not for me to say. But it is sometimes the case that persons in their criticisms upon words and phrases, overlook the fact that the New Testament is not classic Greek. It appears to me, Mr. Editor, that you were yourself guilty of this inadvertence, when in your paper of Nov. 10, 1841, you propose to any Baptist or Pedo-baptist, to translate first day of the week into good classic Greek, &c. Though the New Testament is written in Greek, an acquaintance with the Greek classics does not conduce to a thorough knowledge of the proper signification and extent of the expressions used, so much as an acquaintance with the ancient Hebrew scriptures. Not that classical knowledge is not, even for this purpose, of real utility; only, that it is not of so great utility as the other. At least, such was the opinion of that Prince of Biblical critics, Dr. Geo. Campbell.

The proposed emendation would not, probably, be very objectionable if it concerned no other places than Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2. But in Matt. xxviii. 8, and in the parallel places, the expression is evidently used to designate the particular time when the women visited the sepulchre.—The authors, like those conscious of the truth of what they narrate, appear to aim at great exactness. But if the clause be rendered as above, where is the exactness? We are, for aught I can see, still left in the dark as the time when this visit took place, as much as if the writers had not pretended to tell us. To make out the case, we are told that sabbaton, being plural, cannot justly be rendered in the singular. Hence, opse sabbaton is made to read in the end of the sabbaths, relating, as is said, to a fact which had actually occurred, viz. one weekly sabbath, and one paschal sabbath, whether they occurred together or separately." But how does this agree with Mark xvi. 1, where the singular is used? See also Jno. xix. 31. Again, it is said, in the second instance of the occurrence of the word sabbaton, viz. in the clause literally rendered 'as it began to dawn towards one of the sabbaths,' we may reasonably suppose, that reference is had to the "seven sabbaths complete" which were to be numbered from the first Paschal Sabbath before the feast of Pentecost." According to this view, the sense of the passage would be, in the end of the sabbaths, as it began to dawn towards one of the weeks. But again I ask, where is the exactness? The construction seems to exhibit the writer as aiming to give exact information, and yet after all not giving it. To tell us that the sabbath was over, and it began to draw towards one of the seven weeks that succeeded, is to tell us nothing. So far as any definite information is conveyed by it, we might as well have been told that somewhere between Passover and Pentecost, the women visited the sepulchre, and found their Lord had left it! I submit it to any plain reader whether he thinks the sacred narrative designed to leave it so loose.

I have been prompted to these remarks by a firm persuasion that the cause of the Sabbath, has nothing to gain by a denial of the commonly received opinion that Christ rose from the grave on the first day of the week, and nothing to loose by admitting it. For my own part, I have not the smallest wish to do away any force there may be in the argument for Sunday keeping founded on the Resurrection. It is but a phantom when all is done. I pretend to no overweening confidence in the soundness of my criticism; but such as it is, I submit it to my brethren. If it is erroneous, I wish it to be proved so, for truth is my object.

Thoughts Concerning Christ.

"What think ye of Christ? whose son is he?"—Matt. xxii. 42.

This is a fair and proper question, and also a very important one; as it was sometimes asked by our Lord, concerning himself. The answer of the Pharisees, was,—"The son of David." But Simon Peter answered another time—"Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God."

Notwithstanding the apparent difference between what is called, the "Trinitarian," and the "Unitarian," yet, I can but flatter myself that they will both agree with me, in the brief view which I shall now present on this subject.

1. Jesus Christ is, as fairly, and as properly, the son of the living God, as Seth was the son of Adam, or, as Isaac was the son of Abraham. See Luke i. 35, John i. 18, and iii. 16, 18, 35. He is called the "son of God," more than forty times in the scriptures.

2. He is fairly, and properly the son of man, according to the flesh. He "was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared to be the son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."—Rom. i. 3, 4. He is called the "son of man" some eighty times.

3. Then, if Jesus Christ is both "the son of God," and "the son of man"—if he is "God's own son," and yet the son of Mary, (Matt. i. 23,) then it follows most clearly, and most conclusively, that he is both "God," and "man." And the most proper Being that could be, as Mediator between God and man. He is called "God," Psalms xiv. 6. "The Mighty God," Isa. ix. 6. "God with us," Matt. i. 23. "My Lord and my God," John xx. 28. "God manifest in the flesh," 1 Tim. iii. 15. He is called "man," Zech. xiii. 7, 1 Cor. xv. 47, and in other places.

4. He is to be worshiped as God, which is a further proof that he is God. It is written, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." And again, when he bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, he saith, "And let all the angels of God worship him." And again, (Mark vii. 8,) "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." And again, "That all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father." And again, the Apostles "worshiped him and returned to Jerusalem." See Rev. v. and to 14.

5. There is "one Lord." Zech. xiv. 9, Eph. iv. 5, Deut. vi. 4; yet Jesus Christ is Lord: for "God hath highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow,—and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."—Eph. ii. 9 to 11. Thus was Thomas perfectly right in calling him "My Lord and my God." Neither was he reproved for thus calling him; but Jesus said, "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed." He is "Lord both of the dead and of the living." "He is Lord of all."—He is "Lord even of the' [seventh day] 'Sabbath." Mat. xiii. 8.

6. "God is a spirit." John iv. 24, 2 Cor. iii. 17. Now "there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." Here we behold two parties; first, a holy and just God; second, unreconciled men. Now we have a most proper and suitable Mediator partly "of God," and partly of "man." Hence we say, "That God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself." Again, John speaks of "Him that is true," and "his son Jesus Christ," and says, this is the true God and eternal life." 1 John v. 20.

7. "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one." That is, when Christ was baptized, the Father is first which spake the word from heaven, the Word which was spoken is second, and the Holy Spirit in bodily shape like a dove upon him is third: these three bear record that Jesus Christ is the son of God. I John v. 7, 9. But the Holy Ghost is "the Comforter, the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father," whom Christ would "send from the Father," to reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment—to comfort the children of God, and to guide the church "into all truth." Christ "baptizeth with the Holy Ghost," and washeth with the "washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost."

But I would respectfully ask, why St. John, in his "Revelation," gives no account of Trinitarians worshiping a "Trinity," or a "Triune God." But the true worship in that "Revelation of Jesus Christ," appears to be exclusively given to the Lord God and to the Lamb. Rev. vii. 10, and v. 12, 13, 14, and xxi. 22, 23, and xxii. 3, 4.

In my humble opinion such words and phraseologies as "Trinity," "Triune God," "Trinitarian," "Unitarian," "Three coequal, co-eternal, self-existent persons in one God," &c., cause divisions and persecutions among the professed disciples of Christ, and should be disapproved by all the people of God.

But let "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," say, "Blessing, honor, glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever."

The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

Washington, March 21.

Various Items and Thoughts.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the Committee on Foreign Relations were instructed to report on the expediency of reducing the number and salaries of the diplomatic corps, 173 to 6, the latter constituting the original "corporal's guard" of the President's friends, who were averse to diminishing his patronage, of course.

The report of the Committee on Elections, that Hon. J. R. Lowell was entitled to his seat, was confirmed by the House with little opposition.

A host of tariff petitions have been offered, chiefly in the Senate. The reports of the two tariff committees are expected in a few days, when the attention of Congress will be at once absorbed in the discussions of that subject. The resolves of the Legislature of Ohio in favor of the remission of Gen. Jackson's fine (!) and those of Louisiana, denouncing Mexico for her alleged cruelties to the Texians captured in the marauding expedition to Santa Fe, and calling for the interposition of our government in a matter that does not concern us, were offered in the Senate to-day. Mr. Huntington, of Ct., continued the interminable tariff debate.

Resolution Day—The Creole Case—A Storm.

To-day, in regular course, was set apart for the introduction of business, chiefly in the form of resolves. One calling for a report of the fees and pay of the U. S. Marshals in Mississippi, and New York, which are enormous, was adopted with a view to their reduction. Two bills relative to U. S. Courts in Arkansas and E. Tennessee, was read twice and referred, then a resolve to change the 127th rule so as to cut short the interminable debates, was adopted after a struggle, 105 ayes to 98 noes. It will shorten the session six weeks.

Resolves relating to certain mail routes in Georgia; to a canal to connect Albemarle Sound with the ocean; Courts in N. C.; some harbor in Georgia; calling on the President to report all officers appointed by him since April 4th, 1841, the State where from, and residence at the date of appointment; also the names of all members of Congress who had directly or indirectly applied for offices since 1838; one to instruct the Committee on Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of laying 20 per cent. duty on all wines, silks, and other free goods, to be increased 10 per cent. annually, till other countries took off their duties on American tobacco; and one to appoint a select committee on some of the many fictitious claims growing out of the Florida war, which have been rejected by the law on claims, very justly, but which are pertinaciously urged—all these were adopted.

Then came the storm. The first mutterings of it came from Medill, an Ohio Democrat, who offered a resolve to censure any member who should hereafter present any petition for the dissolution of the Union, as being an indignity to the House, and what not! He moved the previous question on the adoption of it, but it was not seconded, ayes 70, noes 76. So the first cloud passed over with a few harmless rain drops.—Then came the tempest,—Mr. Giddings, of Ohio, rose and said he had some resolves to offer for consideration at some future time on a subject that had for some time excited a deep interest in the Senate, and in the country at large; and submitted nine resolves to the effect that slavery, prior to the Constitution, was a purely State institution; that no power over it was ceded to the U. S. by that instrument; that exclusive jurisdiction over commerce on the high seas was ceded; that slavery existed only by positive municipal law, and must therefore be confined to the jurisdiction of the power that created it; that the persons on board a vessel leaving any of our ports, when they reached the "high seas," ceased to be subject to the slave laws of any State, and were amenable only towards U. S. laws for their conduct towards each other; that the slaves of the brig Creole in resuming their natural rights on the high seas, violated no law of the U. S. and were amenable to no other law; that all attempts to re-enslave them were unauthorized by the Constitution, and incompatible with our national honor; and that all attempts to exert our national influence in favor of a "commerce in human beings" are violations of the rights, and injurious to the feelings and interests of the free States; unauthorized by the Constitution and injurious to the character of our government.

The logic of the resolves cannot be met. The commotion this excited was like the storm, when Mr. Adams offered the Haverhill petition. It was soon found that their reception could not be avoided under the rules. A motion from a timid man to lay on the table was voted down, 52 to 125, and Holmes, of S. C., arose—"Mr. Speaker, there are certain topics that cannot be discussed." Rap! went the ivory mallet. The frightened slaveholders moved the previous question, and it was seconded, 116 ayes, noes not counted. The main question was then ordered, 122 to 61, and the question on adopting the resolves came up. Several members asked to be excused from voting, some to urge delay, some to "defend their position." Floyd, of New York, and Fessenden, of Maine, were not ready to vote on resolves so important without time to examine them. Cushing, of Mass., cried "they are a British argument, and almost treasonable!" Mr. Fillmore asked Mr. G. to withdraw them, and after a struggle to hinder it, Mr. Giddings having accomplished his purpose of presenting the subject before the public, did so. The noise and confusion during this half hour were tremendous.

Botts, of Va., anxious to purge himself of suspicion of too much regard for liberty, immediately, moved to suspend the rules, to allow him to offer a resolve to censure Mr. Giddings for proposing ideas calculated to divide the people, in regard to the measures of Government (!!) justifying "mutiny" and "murder," in terms "shocking to the feelings of the house," etc. The suspension was refused, 124 to 68, not two-thirds. After a few trivial matters they were renewed by Walker, of O., (Democrat,) as his own resolves, in a slightly different form. It was now after 3 o'clock, and Winthrop, of Mass., moved an adjournment. "The ayes have it," said the Chair. Then a perfect yell arose, "divide," and the vote stood 63 to 111.—The P. Q. was then moved, but the Chair decided that Mr. Giddings could not be precluded, in that way, from his right to defend himself. A long and noisy series of—not speeches, but interjectional sentences, (to coin a phrase,) mingled with points of order, and appeals, with noises many and strange, occupied nearly two hours, when the House adjourned. Mr. Giddings is ready to meet the issue, fully, if reflection does not teach the slaveholders to avoid it, by to-morrow. The truth is, the sober part of the Southern members do not differ from Mr. Giddings' resolves; but they wish to keep up the threatening aspect of war, to gain as much from Great Britain as they can by negotiation.—And it begins to leak out that some of the Cabinet do not sustain Mr. Webster's views in his famous despatch. The official paper, the Madisonian, has articles, original and copied, to the effect that no war can properly grow out of it. Ah! it is one thing to talk of war, and to threaten it: and quite another matter to vote for it, in the form of a law, with all the dread train of consequences that may, nay, must follow. But so mad for their idols are the slaveholders and their allies, that if we are saved from all its horrors, it must be the result, in a great degree, of this very "impudent" presentation of the true doctrine, on this subject, to the sober part of the people, as Mr. Giddings has done in these manly and statesman-like resolves. And is it come to this? Is a member to be censured by the House for offering resolves expressive of the views of nine-tenths of the reflecting men in the nation, on a question on which the rash and violent are endeavoring to plunge the nation into war? Is this the blessing of a union with the slaveholding States? Must no one dare to express doubts of the righteousness of a war in defense of the American slave trade? In truth, ever since their galling defeat in Mr. Adams' case, the slaveholders have wanted a victim, and they hope to find one in Mr. Giddings. We shall soon see how much they are mistaken.

News of the Day.

Opening of the State Canals.—The New York papers are calling on the Canal Commissioners to open the State canals for navigation at the earliest day practicable. If the season continues to be as favorable as it is now, we should think there could be no difficulty in opening the canals by the first of April.—Alb. Daily Adv.

A Factory Girl.—The Newburyport Herald says, that a few years since a girl was employed at the spindles in one of the manufacturing establishments in Ware; subsequently she taught school; and still later found her way to the West. She is now the worthy wife of the Representative from Michigan.

American Mechanism.—A splendid rifle, ordered by the Emperor of Russia, has been made by Mr. Billinghurst, of Rochester, and was boxed up to be shipped on Monday. It had a black walnut stock, gold mountings, and cost $400. A man has been engaged on it steadily for three months.

Mortality in New York.—The number of interments in the city during the past year, as reported by the inspector, was 9,115.—This number is 520 larger than that of the preceding year, but not proportionally larger than the increase of population. The deaths from diseases of respiratory and digestive organs, and also from diseases of the brain and nervous system, have increased. Those from eruptive fevers, from disease of the heart, and unknown diseases, have been less than during the previous year.

The deaths from consumption were 1,470; and of those over ten years of age 647 were native born, and 644 were of foreign birth. The number of interments in the city for each year, during the last 18 years, were as follows:

1824	4,341	1833	5,746
1825	5,018	1834	9,082
1826	4,973	1835	7,082
1827	5,181	1836	8,009
1828	5,181	1837	8,732
1829	5,091	1838	8,053
1830	5,537	1839	7,953
1831	6,363	1840	8,474
1832	10,359	1841	9,115

Total, 124,293
Deaths in 18 years, 116,697
Still born, 7,596
124,293

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

By and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Thomas H. Blount re-appointed Collector of the Customs at Washington, North Carolina.

Robert Digges re-appointed Surveyor of the Revenue at Nanjemoy, Maryland.

Richard W. Greene to be Attorney of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, re-appointed.

Canal Bank of Lockport.—An unfounded report, that this sound and now well regulated institution had refused to redeem its notes, obtained some currency this morning, in this city. The subjoined notice, which has appeared in our advertising columns for the last five days, probably prompted this attempt to shave the holders of the notes of this bank.

The Canal Bank of Lockport, on the 17th inst., and thereafter, will redeem its circulating notes at the American Exchange Bank, New York, at 1-2 per cent.; —from that time the Com. Bank, Albany, will cease to redeem the notes of the said first named bank.

Albany, 14th March, 1842.

Attempt to Assassinate in West Jersey.—On Monday evening an attempt was made in the street at Bordentown to assassinate Mr. Kester, the keeper of the rail road hotel of that town. He was beset, according to the Philadelphia Ledger, by two or three persons, one of whom stabbed him. Fortunately the weapon did not penetrate his body, being prevented by the thickness of his clothing.

Appointment of Post Master at New York.—The nomination of John Lorimer Graham, Esq., for Post Master in the city of New York, was confirmed, without opposition, by the Senate. This appointment, we infer from the manner it is received, is generally acceptable to the citizens of New york. Mr. Graham will make an efficient, attentive, and obliging officer. We were originally in favor of a different appointment, and since that name was withdrawn, several others have been presented with whose appointment we should have been gratified. As it is, and considering how things go at Washington, we only wonder that the appointment should finally have been as worthily bestowed.—Albany Eve. Jour.

Well Matched.—The census of Washington County, Vermont, for 1841, gives a total of 11,753 males and 11,753 females. Of these, 11 males and 10 females are colored persons.—Eve. Jour.

Thanksgiving in Texas.—The 22d day of March being the anniversary of the National Independence of Texas, President Houston has recommended that the day be observed as one of devotional exercises, thanksgiving, and prayer.

It is stated that the slave trade has increased to a frightful extent on the shores of northern Africa, and in the Mediterranean. The Greek Marine is engaged in this traffic, and the Tuscan flag is also made use of.

HORRIBLE MURDER AND PARRICIDE

Office of the Spirit of the Times,
BATAVIA, March 17, 1842.

To the Editors of the Argus:

A murder was yesterday committed in Byron, which, for its cold blooded atrocity, is almost unparalleled. A young man by the name of Benjamin T. White, having, for several years past, had a grudge against his father, on account of not being put in possession of a portion of property, determined to satiate his revengeful feelings by murdering both his father and step-mother. White came up to the house as his parent was entering the door; he took hold of his coat collar, pulled him about so as to face him, took out a pistol from his pocket, and shot him through, just under the shoulder. He then threw him down, and commenced beating him with the butt of the pistol.—The step-mother immediately ran to the assistance of her husband, and had the presence of mind to reach down and pick up the pistol, (which had fallen in the affray,) and was rising up, when she perceived the murderer drawing another from his pocket which he raised at her; and she only escaped her husband's fate by throwing up her arm and diverting the aim of the pistol, which was fired, but without effect. The young man then made for the woods, but was pursued by a number of citizens, and arrested in three or four hours. In speaking of the murder to one of the captors, he said, "I don't know whether I killed the old man or not; but I meant to—I took good aim."

I have seen a letter written to his father last winter, which abounds in more abusive, outrageous and impious language, than I ever saw condensed into an equal space. He closes the letter with this:—"So fare ye well for the present, you contemptible old jackass, and spawn of an adder."

White is safely lodged in our miserable and ricketty old jail.

Something Singular.—The Westminster Democrat says that a lady in that county recently deceased, a short time before her death, threw up from her stomach, a lobster of about two inches in length, apparently such as are usually found in fresh waters. It is supposed that she must have swallowed it in drinking, while it was yet small, and that it occasioned her death. When it was ejected from her stomach it was dead, having probably been destroyed by the medicine she had taken.

The Red River Raft, has been so far removed that a steamboat passed through it on the 20th ult.

Mr. James S. Lawrence, candidate for Judge of the Elections in Lower Delaware Ward, died on Friday noon, during the canvass of the polls.

The last accession to the surrendering Indians, at Tampa, was that of the Chief Asynoeis, and his band, consisting of twenty one warriors and fifty seven women and children.

During the month of February there arrived, at the various ports of the U. S. 5 ships and four brigs, engaged in the whale trade, bringing 8,456 barrels of sperm oil, and 6,600 barrels whale oil—total barrels, 15,056.

The splendidly furnished mansion of Mr St. Clair Clarke, at Washington, has been hired for the use of Lord Ashburton. It is next door to the residence of Mr. Webster.

By laws recently passed, the Banks of Ohio were required to resume on the 4th of March; those of Pennsylvania on the 12th of the same month; and those of Maryland on the 2d of May; those of Indiana on the 15th of June; and those of New Jersey on the 15th of August.

The Rev. Sylvester Judd, one of the Chaplains of the Legislature of Maine, was dismissed on Monday by a vote of 127 to 5, for preaching a sermon the preceding day which reflected severely on Washington and the Chiefs of the American Revolution.

In the space of eleven weeks, Elder Knapp has preached, at Boston, 180 sermons.

A Mr. Tompkins and Col. Cook fought a duel a few days since opposite Vicksburg. Weapons, pistols; distance, 50 paces; result, both killed. We should think this satisfactory.

A man was robbed of $600 dollars while standing on the steps of the bank of the Northern Liberties, Philadelphia. He was after specie, but some person removed the 'deposites' before he had an opportunity to touch the silver.

Major Reily, Charge d'Affairs of the Republic of Texas, has arrived in Washington.

On the 9th ult. a Mr. William McClung, residing in Nicholas co. Va., on returning at night from the county town, some twelve miles distant, found his house burned to the ground, and his wife and four small children lying on the snow, dead—having perished by exposure. Mr. McClung was crazed by the awful calamity.

A fatal encounter, the result of jealous rivalry to the favor of a young lady, occurred at Augusta, Ga., a few days since, between Thomas Hutchinson and J. McMellon, in which the former drew a knife and killed the latter on the spot.

Virginia has, by a vote of her Legislature, refused to participate in the avails of the land distribution bill.

On the 9th inst. the wife of a wretch named Bird, at Pittsburg, Pa., was burned so terrible that she cannot recover. When discovered, her husband was standing by making no effort to save her; her arms and feet were tied, and she afterwards made oath that the drunken brute had tied her thus to her chair, gagged her, and then set her clothes on fire.

The Ohio Legislature has repealed every part of every law which gives to towns and villages in that State, the power to license drinking shops.

A merchant lately advertised for a clerk accustomed to confinement. He received an answer from one who had been seven years in jail!

Steamboat Explosion and Loss of Life.—The Mobile Morning Herald of the 4th inst., says: "By the arrival of the Steamer Canebrake, from Logan's Bluff, last evening, we have received the confirmation of the rumor brought us yesterday morning of an explosion of the boilers of the steamer North Star, and the fatal loss of life attendant on it. The occurrence took place at about ten or twelve miles below Tuscaloosa, on her passage down on the 25th ult. After the explosion, the boat took fire and burned to the water's edge and sunk. Fifteen persons are said to have been killed, among whom are Col. C. D. Conner, of Marengo, and a Mr. Tannahill, of Tuscaloosa county, passengers; both of the engineers, one of the pilots, the bar-keeper and several firemen and deck hands. The captain, J. Parham, and the pilot, were both blown into the river, but succeeded in reaching the shore—the latter severely injured.

A Change in the Rates of Postage.—The Postmaster General has submitted to the consideration of the Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, the outlines of a bill proposing that all letters and packages now paying a postage of 6 1-4 cents, shall hereafter pay but 5 cents—those paying 12 1-2 cents to pay only 10, and those 18 3-4 to be increased to 20 cts. All way newspapers to be subject to postage.

The Exploring Expedition.—Amongst the passengers of the Wm. Bryant, at New Orleans, from Vera Cruz, were Lieut. R. E Johnson, Simon Blunt, and Dr. Chas. Guillou, of the United States Navy, and P. A. Brinsmade, Esq., U. S. Consul at the Sandwich Islands.

The party left the Sandwich Islands about the end of December last. The Exploring Squadron may be expected home about the month of July. They left the Sandwich Islands on the 27th November, bound to Manilla, via the Zooloo sea, thence to Singapore, and touching at Rio Janeiro, will proceed directly to the United States—officers and crew generally in good health.

The U. S. Consul, Mr Brinsmade, bears despatches from the Commodore of the Exploring Expedition to the government at Washington.—N. Y. Sun.

An Alarming Decision.—An English paper says that a decision has just been given in the Court of Queen's Beach, Ireland, which will carry alarm into many a family. All marriages in Ireland, celebrated by Presbyterian ministers, where both parties are not Presbyterians, are declared invalid. The Presbyterians in Ulster amount to upwards of 600,000, and, we understand nothing was more common than the celebration of marriages between Presbyterians and the members of other communities, by Presbyterian ministers.

Bankrupt Applications.—No applications in the Districts of Indiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, or either of the Territories, have as yet been published, that we are aware of. Nor has any Court for the hearing of these cases been held in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. The number of applications in both of the Districts of New York is 1755. The number in New England is 2194. In the Middle States, including the District of Columbia, the number is 1053, In the other States the number is 634, of which 181 are in Alabama, 142 in Illinois. The number of applicants who were members of mercantile firms is far greater in Rhode Island, in proportion to the entire number of applicants in that District, than in any of the other Districts. Of the applicants 6 are females.—Journ. of Com.

What Can be Done.—Several months since a philanthropic citizen of New York fitted up a capacious dwelling on Bergen Hights, about a mile from Jersey City, and commenced sending to it all the destitute and wretched beings he could find who would sign the Temperance pledge, and were willing to go. Many of them were drunkards who for years had rolled weekly in the gutter, and wives and mothers equally degraded, together with many sick persons and helpless children—with such materials was this new colony commenced. Every one was required to work at such labor as could be found, for the support of the concern, being free to leave whenever he could do better. Wholesome food, and such clothing and other necessaries as could be procured were furnished—and the institution having now been in operation several months, the efficacy of the principle is fully tested. It deserves encouragement, and as the enterprise needs immediate aid, by donations or a loan, we hope Washingtonians generally will feel sufficient interest in it not to let it go down. All are now invited to visit the establishment, and make such inquiries as they choose in relation to its objects, management, &c. Mr, G. M. Danforth, the director, will faithfully appropriate any aid left with Mr. Danford, 159 Water st., or Mr. Beatty, corner of Washington and Jay sts., to the interests of the institution.—*N. Y. According to the returns of the official census for 1841, the population of Paris and its outskirts is one million one hundred and fifty thousand seven-hundred and twenty-nine.

On the 6th inst., all the buildings of Jefferson College, Mo,, with their contents, were consumed by fire. Loss about $150,-000; insurance $60,000.

Benjamin F. Smith, the occupant of a store at Waterville, Oneida co., has been arrested on a charge of setting fire to and burning his store, to defraud the Albany Insurance Company of $2,800.

A Boston correspondent of the Evening Post, under date of the 19th inst., says: "Mr. Justice Story has to-day decided that a wife's jewelry must be surrendered in cases of bankruptcy. The decision has this moment been made."

Mr. D. K. McRae, bearer of despatches to the Minister of the United States at Mexico, has arrived at New Orleans. He returns to Washington, says the Picayune, "with documents from our Minister of very great importance."

Number of Tetotalers in Ireland.—The last ticket, says the Lord Mayor of Dublin, signed by Father Mathew, was marked five millions two thousand seven hundred and two.

Imprisonment for Debt.—The Barre Gazette says that there is confined in the jail at Worcester, for debt, an old man, between sixty and seventy years of age, of so feeble health that his life is hardly expected. We are told that the creditor is a lawyer of considerable notoriety, if not eminence, in the north part of the country.

Mr. Norris, the celebrated locomotive engine maker, has received from the Emperor of Russia, a splendid ring valued at $6,000, as a compliment to his skill and ingenuity.—Phil. Inquirer.

Land Suit.—An interesting suit was tried at the late term of the Chatauque Circuit. It was an action of ejectment brought by John Duer, Morris Robinson, and Wm. H. Seward, against Geo. Handy, of the town of Hanover, in which it became necessary for the plaintiffs to show title to the land in question. This was done by the exhibition of 27 legislative acts, treaties with Indians, and deeds from individuals and companies, commencing with the act passed by the Legislature of this State in 1784, appointing commissioners to meet commissioners on the part of Massachusetts; the resolution of Massachusetts in '91, appointing a committe with power to sell to Samuel Ogden; his release to Morris; the various deeds by which the title vested in the "Holland Land Company," and at last their deed to the plaintiffs.

The suit involved the whole question of title to lands on the "Holland Purchase," respecting which there has been so much dispute. The Westfield Messenger says it was proved on the part of the defendant, that he has been in possession of the premises 22 years this month. On cross examination it appeared that the defendant purchased the right of another individual, who had the land in question 'booked' to him at the land office in Mayville many years ago.—Buffalo Com.

The Mendi Africans.—We have already chronicled the safe arrival of Cinque and his companions at Sierra Leone, in the barque Gentleman, Capt. Morris. Letters from the captain were received yesterday by the owners, via. Salem. He says that the Africans and missionaries were landed in good health at Freetown, on the 18th of January, after which Capt. Morris went southward, his letters being dated from a point on the coast considerably to the south of Sierra Leone.

A legacy of $500 dollars has been recently left to the Mendi Mission by the late Horatio Taylor, of Nelson, Portage county Ohio.

Important from the West.—Rumors are in circulation in the West that the tribes of Indians removed from the United States prior to the western line, are about to form a grand confederacy, or one tribe, for hostile purposes. It is also stated that an interview was had with the British minister at Washington, by the notorious John Ross, the chief of the Cherokees, while on a visit to that place a short time since.

The American Slave owners and the Creole.—A letter on the subject of the Creole and the demand of the American slave-owners for the blood of the slaves who rescued themselves by mastering the vessels, has just been published from Judge Jay at New York, to Joseph Sturgis, Esq. The Judge demonstrates that even admitting the slaves to be murderers, no international law between England and the United States, requires their surrender. A treaty in 1794, stipulating for the mutual surrender of murderers, has expired, and since that time the United States have refused to surrender one Holmes, the author of a murder in Canada, and the two Bambers, who fled from Ireland for the same crime. "Also in the case of the Amistad negroes," says the venerable American judge, "we refused to surrender the alleged murderers to the Spanish minister." The idea of surrendering these unfortunates simply as fugitive slaves, is of course more preposterous still, when Canada has already afforded, and continues to afford, refuge to 12,000 slaves, to whom a bound across the British frontier does justice instantly.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

DIED,

In Verona, on the 8th inst., of Consumption, SARAH WILLIAMS, widow of Joshua Williams, aged 53 years. Sister Williams publicly professed her faith in the Redeemer in early life, and united with the Seventh Day Baptist Church in Petersburg, where she continued till with her husband she removed to Verona and united with the church in that place, of which she remained an exemplary and devoted member until her death. For the last five years she has suffered much, but without a murmer she bore it all. By this dispensation of Providence her family and relatives have sustained an irreparable loss, and the church has been bereft of one of its most worthy members. "The memory of the just is blessed."

Also, in Verona, on the 2d of December, after three weeks distressing sickness, SARAH A., daughter of Hiram & Salome Sherman, aged 4 months and 14 days

This lovely flower so young and fair,
Called hence by early doom,
Just came to show how sweet a flower
In heaven above shall bloom.

At Alfred, Dec. 11, 1841, of fever, ESTHER, wife of Libbeus Cottrell, aged 35 years.

At the same place on the 13 of Dec., her mother, the widow AMY HALL, of fever, aged 77 years.

At Alfred, Dec. 31st, ANDREW J. HALL, in the 23d year of his age.

Also, on the 8th of Feb., DANIEL C HALL. aged 9 years. The only children of Jeremiah Hall.

At Alfred on the first of Jan., Mr. WILLIAM HAMILTON in the 90th year of his age, after a short and severe illness which he bore with Christian patience, and has gone home as a shock of corn fully ripe in its season. He was a member of the 1st Church of Alfred.

In Alfred, of scarlet fever, the last week in February, four children of Cornelius Rice, three of whom were buried in one day. Thus they have been called to mourn the loss of four children in so short a time. May the Lord give them supporting grace in all the trials they are called to pass through.

At Adams on the 18th inst., Mr. ASA MAXSON, aged 90 years and 12 days. His death was occasioned by his falling backwards down a flight of stairs which he was ascending. He survived the shock only one hour. His funeral was attended on the 20th at Adam's Village by a large concourse of citizens of the adjoining towns. Mr. Maxson was a native of Westerly, R. I In early life he professed religion and united with the S. D. Church in Hopkinton. In 1793 he removed to Rensselaer co., N. Y., where he united with the S. D. Baptist church, now called Berlin Church, with which he continued a member until he with others were dismissed to form the church at Petersburg. In 1835 he removed to Adams, Jefferson county, where he united with the 7th day Baptist Church of that place, of which he continued an acceptable member until the day of his death. Mr. Maxson has left a widow and a numerous posterity to mourn his loss.

At Pinckney, Dec. 15th, 1841, Mr. RUSSELL GREEN, aged 61. His death was occasioned by apoplexy. He survived the attack but a few hours. Mr. Greene has been a member of the S. D. B. Church at Adams ever since it was organized.

In Hopkinton, on the 27th of Dec., JOHN B., son of Jonathan and Elizabeth Babcock, of lung fever, in the 23d year of his age. He was a worthy member of the 2d S. D Baptist Church in Hopkinton, and died in full hope of a glorious immortality.

IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES'
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.
CAPITAL,
ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!
Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.
CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,
COMBINING
FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE
SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate. This company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

POETRY.

Temperance Ode.

BY PROFESSOR A. C. KENDRICK.

TUNE—Auld Lang Syne.

'Tis come,—bright breaking from on high,
The glorious day is come,
That bids the Temperance Banner fly,
And sounds the dirge of Rum.
Then join we heart and hand, my friends,
Then join we heart and hand;
We pledge our faith to live and die,
A true Cold Water band.

We've broke the bowl—we've dashed it down—
That poisoned fount, no more
Its maddening streams of liquid fire,
Through all our veins shall pour.
Then join we heart and hand, &c.

Henceforth to cheer our fainting souls,
To quench our burning thirst,
We seek the streams, rich, pure and free,
From nature's founts that burst.
Then join we heart and hand, &c.

Our Eagle spreads his pinions now
Into the broad, blue skies,
Exulting that beneath his wing,
No fell destroyer lies
Then join we heart and hand, &c.

The land's awake!—from South and North,
From East and West they come!
Fling freedom's banner proudly forth,
And sound the dirge of Rum.
Then join we heart and hand, &c.

Then round our banner rally, friends,
In faith and friendship strong,
And shout—to make the welkin ring—
The chorus of our song.

Come join we heart and hand, my friends
Come join we heart and hand,
'Neath yon bright banner, fight for aye,
A true Cold Water band.

LIFE IN LONDON.

THE JEWS.

THE HEBREW NATION next claims a share of our attention, as representing the most numerous, important, and wealthy body of distinct people in London.

The man who can look a Jew full in the face, (we do not allude to Sloman, or any other of the Hebrew fraternity of bums, fellows that we can not bear to contemplate otherwise than at the top of our speed,) without perusing in his oval phiz, high, pale forehead, dark, deep-set, flashing eye, a volume of the romance of history, more eloquent than Josephus ever writ, must have no more association in his pate than a block of the New Patent Timber Paving Company.

Talk of pedigrees, forsooth!—tell us of the Talbots, Persys, Howards, and such like mushrooms of yesterday!—show us a Jew, and we will show you a man whose genealogical tree springs from Abraham's bosom—whose family is older than the Decalogue, and who bears incontrovertible evidence in every line of his oriental countenance, of the authenticity of his descent through myriads of successive generations. You see in him a living argument of the truth of Divine revelation—in him you behold the literal fulfilment of the prophecies. With him you ascend the stream of time, not voyaging by the help of the dim, uncertain, and fallacious light of tradition, but guided by an emanation of the same light, which, to his nation, was "a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night:" in him you see the representative of the once favored people of God, to whom, as to the chosen of all mankind, HE revealed himself their legislator, protector and king; who brought them out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. "Israelites," as St. Paul saith, "to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises: whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came; who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen."

You behold him established, as it were, for ever, in the pleasant places allotted to him: you trace him by the peculiar mercy of his God in his transition states from bondage to freedom; and by the innate depravity of his human nature, from prosperity to insolence, ingratitude, and rebellion: following him on, you find him in the serf of Rome; you trace him from the smouldering ashes of Jerusalem, an outcast and a wanderer to all lands; the persecutor of Christ, you find him in the persecuted of Christians, bearing all things, suffering all things, strong in the pride of human knowledge, stiff-necked and gainsaying, hoping all things, "For the Lord will have mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land; and the stranger shall be joined with them, and they shall cleave to the house of Jacob. And the people shall take them, and bring them to their place: and the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of the Lord, for servants and handmaids; and they shall take them captive whose captive they were; and they shall rule over their oppressors."

The associations connected with the history of the Jews are oppressive in interest, and would lead us far away from the humble and unpretending picture of manners we have proposed to limn in our homely Dutch-like way; he who would bring out in colors of truth and nature the [illegible] of Jewish history, must be the [illegible] of the Teniers of the pen.

[illegible] are awake early in the morning [illegible] "Old Clo'"—[illegible] who the [illegible] all the good housewives to their doors and windows by the dulcet strains of his accordion, only to poke them into an exchange of a pair of discarded unwhisperables for a soup plate, soap dish, or some other article of his miscellaneous crockery—you have no idea of Jews or Judaism in London; you must pack up your traps, make under our experienced tutelage a voyage into the east by 'bus or cab, and when we have shown you the Hebrew district, and initiated you into many of the peculiarities of Hebrew life, if you do not conclude the day by treating us to a jolly "blow out" at the Albion in Bishop's gate, then art thou indeed a very Jew—a Haman, upon whom Mordecai will take unutterable revenge.

The Jewish quarter is literally the New Jerusalem: here we Christians are foreigners, strangers in a strand land: here, over the doors, are inscribed pot hooks and vowel points, indicative, to those who understand them, that Moses Abrahams furnisheth "slops" for home consumption and exportation—this we naturally conclude to be the meaning from the articles exhibited in the windows; for though the sign be Hebrew to them, we need hardly say that it is Greek to us. Within the area bounded as is above described, you might readily imagine yourself transported to Frankfort, Warsaw, or any place enjoying a superabundant Jewish population; here, every face is of the shape, and somewhat of the complexion, of a turkey egg; every brow penciled in an arch of exact ellipse; every nose modeled after the proboscis of a Toucan; locks as bushy and black as those of Absalom abound, and beards of the patriarchal ages. Here, and here abouts, Isaac kills beef and mutton according to the old dispensation: Jacob receives accidental silver spoons, and consigns gold watches, now warranted never more to lose a second, to a crucible, kept always at white heat in his little dark cellar, and no questions asked. Here, at the corners, Rebecca disposes of fried [illegible] and 'tatoes, smoking hot, on little bright burnished copper platters, to all the tribes of Israel not prohibited by law to eat—that is to say, to all who possess the solitary "browns" wherewith to purchase the appetizing dainty. Solomon negotiates in the matter of rags: Esther rejoices in a brisk little business of flat fish fried in oil—a species of dainty which the Jews alone excel: Moses and Aaron keep separate marine stores, where every earthly thing, furtively acquired, from a chain cable to a Cardigan, finds a ready sale: Rachel, albeit a widow, dispenses from behind the "short" and "heavy" to the thirsty tribes: Ruth deals wholesale in oranges and other foreign fruits: Melchizedec dabbleth in Hebrew books and tracts: Absalom sells opium and turkey rhubarb: Mordecai is a "crimp," the vulture of seafaring men: nothing is to be seen above, below, around, but Jewish physiognomies, Jewish houses, and Jewish occupations.

The avidity with which this, in one sense, primitive people pursues gain is not wonderful, when we reflect that gain is all that the, till lately, unrelenting persecution of the Christian has left them to pursue: with money, in the dark days of their history, have they purchased the poor privilege to live; with money have they secured for themselves, in one country connivance, in another toleration, in a third citizenship: with money have they made war, and set by the ears hostile Nazareens:—with money have they negotiated peace—transferred from king to king diadems and sceptres—playing at chuck-farthing with fates and fortunes of European and Asiatic nations. The same all-absorbing thirst of gold that formed the leading principle in the life of that pillar of the Stock Exchange, the well-remembered Rothschild, animates the merest Israelitish urchin who follows through the streets his bearded progenitor, esquire of the clothes' bag: to the pursuit of gain all their energies are directed with an intensity, unscrupulousity, and perseverance unknown to, and unattempted by, any Christian people: money they must, and will have; the lowest depths of knavery, chicanery, and extortion, are practised by this rabble to accomplish this, the end of their existence: for this, the infamous "crimp" grasps the hard earnings of the unsuspecting seaman as soon as he steps upon his native shore, and then spurns him naked into the street: for this, the marine store-dealers and receivers open their seminaries of theft: for this, the current coin of the realm is clipped, and ingots and sovereigns perspire: for this, the pander entraps, and the bawd opens wide the gates that lead to everlasting death, trafficking in Christian flesh for purposes, worse than the worst of slavery.

A foolish, extravagant, and mischievous term has crept into our dictionaries, which is productive of much detriment to the Christian, and great wealth to the Hebrew nation, when applied, as it usually is, in derision of our faithful habiliments—the word "worn-out;" and a more dissipated word, a word more addicted to running out money; a word more directly subversive of the liberty of the subject who is in the habit of encouraging it, does not exist under the "W's" of any known vocabulary. It is a villainous word, and has been the ruin of many a respectable family. Your child's clothes lately made are "worn-out;" your wife's gowns, paid for only a month ago, are "worn-out," though we know very well the gowns are good as new, the only thing worn out being the fashion: her bonnets are "worn-out" in consequence of the weather—meaning of the fashion: your servants liveries and livery hats are always worn out, which is no way wonderful, considering that wearing out every thing belonging to their masters is the chief end of their existence: your harness is worn out, your horses are worn out, your carriage is worn out; last of all, your patience is worn out; every thing in your establishment is worn to a thread, and so are you. Go study morals in Rag Fair; any hour of the day, from nine in the morning until six at night, will you hear eloquent sermons from the lips of Rabbis upon the wickedness and folly of supposing that any habiliment in human shape divine can ever be worn out: go, dull clods, and behold the hats, coats, gowns, petticoats, bonnets, and shawls, which you and your wife, tempting the wrath of Providence, have sacrilegiously sold as little, or benevolently given away as good for nothing. There may you behold the third best hat you presented to ourselves the other day, in regard to what you were pleased to call our distinguished literary attainments, and which you told your lady wife you might as well give way, being half a size too little for your head, besides not being worth three half-pence, and which we incontinently trucked for two pence worth of Betts' patent brandy; to-morrow that hat, furbished into a second birth, new lined and banded, will be found ticketed in Holywell street at six-and-six-pence, not merely as good, but, as Moses will tell you, clinching the asseveration with an oath, "more betterer as new." Regard that chaos of old boots—boots, did we say? old leathers rather; a bushel of boots for one-and-six-pence; next week, having gone through the hands of a score of renovators, you may behold these identical leathers black-balled to the nines, on a stall in Field Lane, sold for half-a-guinea a pair, and warranted to every thing—wear and tear only excepted.

Behold that venerable ruin of a coat; powers of tatters! is it possible that Mr. Pobble O'Keefe, the Irish importer, (we should have observed before that three of the four provinces of Ireland are clothed out of the Rag Fair,) is about to add that venerable remain to his dilapidated "properties?" It is so. He has turned the vestment inside out over again, looking for the right side, but in vain; the garment having been turned so often that both sides are wrong ones. Now he holds it expanded upon his arms between him and the light, which streams in broken rays through sundry apertures. Anon, he exhibits a "joey" between his thumb and forefinger; Moses extends three digits in reply; the Milesian shakes his head; the Hebrew plucks his beard, dances about on his axis, uttering untranslatable imprecations. Mr. Pobble O'Keefe, moved by the pathos of Moses, exhibits in addition a couple of browns; the bargain is struck, the "tin" transferred, and the rag forked into the ware-room above stairs, to be packed for exportation.

Extract from a Lecture to young men, by the Rev. Dr. Hawes, delivered in the Centre church Conference room, on the last Sabbath evening in February, 1842.—Christian (Hartford) Secretary.

"Let no young man think of leading a life of ease or pleasure. It is in itself a poor, contemptible sort of life, as barren of true enjoyment, as it is of usefulness. No, it is a law of our creation, a law ordained in paradise and never repealed—man must labor, must be actively employed in some useful calling in order to be wise, or good, or happy. Every young man should understand this law, and yield a cheerful obedience to it. There are too many at the present day who are fond of getting rid of work; they seek for easy and lazy employments, or no employment at all, and frequently turn out to be poor, miserable beings; or at least, mere cyphers in society. If you, my friends, desire to rise in the world, to be useful, respected, and happy, avoid all wishes to live without labor; labor is a blessing instead of a curse; it makes men healthy, it procures them food, clothing, and every other necessary; it frees them from temptation, makes them virtuous and enterprising, and raises them to wealth, to honor, and to happiness. The working men of our country, I refer, of course, to those who work with their hands, are the only true nobility in it. They are the men of intelligence, the men of influence, the happy and useful men. I never heard of but one party for which I entertained a respect, and that is the Working Men's Party. From this party all immortal and bad men are of course excluded; all busy bodies and idlers, and the whole tribe of the pleasure loving, and the frivolous, and it admits to its privileges and its honors only the industrious, the virtuous and enterprising portion of the community. To this party every young man should aspire to belong. Let him at once make up his mind to be a Working Man. Having chosen his occupation, let him give himself to it with patient, untiring attention, resolved to rise and excel in it. If placed in discouraging circumstances, let him remember the adage of Cicero, Diligentia omnia vincit. Many a dark morning has been succeeded by a bright day. Our worthiest and best men have been formed amid difficulties and trials. Let no young man ever succumb to difficulties, or shrink from toil."

WONDERFUL SAGACITY OF A DOG.—An Edingburg paper tells a strange story of a gentleman belonging to that city, who was many thousand miles from Scotland, accompanied by a favorite dog. He embarked at Port Philip to return home. In the bustle and confusion of preparing for so long a voyage, his favorite dog disappeared about a couple of days before the vessel left Port Philip; and as all the inquiry he was able to make turned out to be fruitless, he was under the necessity of leaving his four-footed friend behind him. He arrived in Edinburg after a voyage of six months, and a few weeks after he was surprised by a visit from the animal he had left at Port Philip about eight months before. Upon inquiry, it turns out that the dog had gone on board of a ship on the eve of sailing for London; that once aboard, he resolutely refused to be put on shore, and by dint of sheer resolution obtained a passage. On his arrival in London, it is ascertained that he reached the lodgings formerly occupied by his master, and failing in discovering him, immediately disappeared, and was not again heard of until his arrival in Edinburg. This is, perhaps, the most extraordinary example on record of the affection and sagacity of the dog. His going on board an English ship many thousand miles from home—his refusal to quit it—his visit to the former lodgings of his master on his arrival in London—and the journey from London to Edinburg—rank the subject of this brief notice, as one of the most wonderful animals of all his species.

SELF-CONCEITED GRAMMARIAN.—Said a pupil to his teacher the other day, with great boldness, "What's the use of parsing? I can't see no use in parsing. I knowed as much about grammar before I parsed, as I do now. I always talked good enough for any body."

Now, reader, how many common-sense blunders did this self-conceited boy make in displaying his knowledge of grammar? Who will tell us?

This young lad would acknowledge the importance of learning the rules and definitions of grammar, but could see no benefit from parsing.

Fearing others may be dark on this subject, I will try to tell what parsing is.

Parsing bears the same relation to the rules of grammar, as cyphering does to the rules of arithmetic.

Would that boy ask, what is the use of doing sums? Oh, no!—he would blush to do it; and doing sums is only applying definitions and rules, and making scholars familiar with them. Is not parsing emphatically the same?

WORDS ODDLY "MIXED UP."—A country merchant advertises "Black men's gloves; Plain lady's slippers; Red children's stockings, and New children's books."

Scholars, please set these words in right order.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

ROOF'S FOUNDER OINTMENT,

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC,

FOR the cure of RING BONE, SPAVIN, WIND GALLS, &c. &c. A certain cure in all cases. Many certificates can be shown, and will be if wished, to place this inestimable specific as a perfect cure, beyond a doubt.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and was administered to more than 18,000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

N. B. Ask for Dr. M. Hitchcock's Worm Tea, as there are many nostrums abroad for the destruction of worms.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

One of the best medicines for common colds Influenzas &c. &c. &c., to be found in the whole catalogue of patent medicines. Give it a try, it is first rate, call and read one of his circulars.

HAVE YOU A COUGH!

70 000 DIE OF CONSUMPTION every year in the United States, and millions suffer from troublesome coughs and colds, that can be cured by Dr Hitchcock's Vegetable Cream Cough Drops, a safe medical prescription, containing no poisonous drugs, and used in an extensive practice for several years will most positively afford relief, and save you from that awful disease, pulmonary consumption, which sweeps into the grave hundreds of the young, the old, the lovely and the gay.

Have you a cough?—Be persuaded to purchase a bottle of the Cough Drops to-day! To-morrow may be too late. Price, 75 cents per bottle.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption: composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

LECTURE III.—THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY G. M. LANGWORTHY.

Let us now look at the accounts which the historians of the New Testament present, and see if these signs of honesty can be found in them.

The first thing which I will notice under this head is the account which St. John has given of the resurrection of Lazarus of Bethany. After relating the conversation which Christ held with his disciples previous to coming into the town, as well also as the conversation with Martha and Mary, the evangelist says, "When Jesus therefore saw her (Mary) weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in spirit, and was troubled, and said, Where have ye laid him? They say unto him, Lord, come and see. Jesus wept. Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him! And some of them said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died? Jesus therefore, again groaning in himself, cometh to the grave.—It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh; for he hath been dead four days. Jesus saith unto her, said I not unto thee that if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God? Then took they away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father I thank thee that thou hast heard me: And I knew that thou hearest me always; but because of the people which stand by, I said it that they may believe that thou hast sent me.—And when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth.—And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes, and his face was bound about with a napkin.—Jesus saith unto them, loose him, and let him go." This is the only notice that is given of Lazarus except that contained in the 12th chapter of the same evangelist, 1 and 2 verses. "Then Jesus, six days before the passover, came to Bethany, where Lazarus was which had been dead, whom he raised from the dead. There they made him a supper, and Martha served; but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him."

Now it appears to me that a novelist, whose object it is to represent scenes in their most lively form, and gain the sympathies of their reader, never would have stated this transaction in such a simple and unvarnished manner. Who does not know what a flow of joy, and what a strain of eulogiums upon Christ would have followed the resurrection of Lazarus? And had this been a fabrication, the writer would have taken every advantage which could have arisen from the transaction. He would have described Martha and Mary, as falling down at Jesus' feet and worshiping him in the most flowing strains of gratitude, calling him my Lord and my God! The other relatives as pressing around Jesus to honor him with their thanks, and their praises. And the Jews that were present, as being perfectly astonished at the thing that was done, and in their wonder and amazement, exclaiming, of a truth, this is the Messiah that was to come! But, instead of this, the evangelist simply states the fact of the resurrection, the affection of Christ for Lazarus, and the conversation which transpired before the scene; and, then, without the least attempt to extol, or add interest to the scene by embellishment, says, and "many of the Jews which came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him." No more is said of the transaction, or of Lazarus, until, as before stated, when Jesus came again into the town, the evangelist mentions his sitting at the table with Christ. Here, again, if this were a fictitious account, the same burst of joy would have been manifested, and, in short, the same scene of eulogiums and congratulations would have been acted over again; and, then, this Lazarus, having been so successfully introduced to the reader, would have been made to act a prominent part in many of the future transactions. His personal appearance, his happy qualifications of character and disposition, and very probably the time and manner of his death would have been described. But how different, how perfectly simple and unvarnished [illegible], and how unconscious of deception must have been the man who wrote it! If there can be found a description of any real scene, in which the signs of honesty are more palpable, I confess that it has never fallen under my notice, and I think that every honest man will acknowledge the same.

2. What I have said concerning the resurrection of Lazarus is applicable to all the miracles recorded in the New Testament. The most stupendous miracles are related without one exclamation of wonder from the historian, and without the least appearance of a desire to excite the wonder of the reader. The character of Christ is drawn in no other way than by telling what he did and said. There is no pourtraying of character in the way of general description, or by using strong epithets to set him forth. There is, as I can find, no such thing in the account given, as an expression of admiration of any discourse or action, on the part of the evangelist. When they describe the sufferings of Christ, they never fall, as men generally do, into pathetic declamation. They are never carried away from their simple course by the power of sympathy. The facts are related as though the writers felt nothing but a strong desire of declaring the truth without giving any color whatever to the facts. Neither do they indulge themselves in those vehement expressions of indignation against the enemies of Christ which we should naturally have expected. They never give utterance to a harsh expression against any one. They relate the treachery of Judas with the same unaffected simplicity as if they had no feeling relative to his base conduct.

3. But there is another circumstance which, if possible, exhibits the true character of the writers in a light still stronger. It is the manner in which they speak of themselves. Few men can write much concerning themselves without betraying the strength of self-love. Weak men, when they speak on this subject are generally disgusting; and even when persons are willing to let the truth be known, they usually make an effort for compensation for every sacrifice they make of reputation.—But we may challenge any one to point out an instance in which the least indications of this moral weakness has been given by the evangelists. They speak of themselves, and of their companions, with the same candor which characterizes their narratives of others, they describe in the most artless manner, the lowness of their origin, the meanness of their occupation, the grossness of their ignorance, the inveteracy of their prejudices, the childishness of their contentions for superiority, their cowardice in the hour of danger, the fatal apostacy of one, and the temporary delinquency of another of their number. If any one supposes that it is an easy matter to write as these men have done, he must be very little acquainted with human nature. It cannot be imitated, even now, when the model is fairly before us. It is wonderful that these men should be able to write books at all with propriety. Few fishermen, or mechanics, confined all their lives to hard labor, and untutored in the art of composition, could produce an intelligible and accurate history of their own lives. But that men of such an education should possess such self-command and self-denial as is manifest in these compositions, can not be accounted for on any other suppositions than that they wrote under some Divine influence.

From the Church Chronicle.

HOW CAN I DO GOOD?

This will be read by some professing Christian; some one, who has perhaps said, or thought, I am not expected to engage personally in the work of doing good to the souls of my fellow creatures. If I were a minister of Christ, my duty would then be plain in this matter; now, I am comparatively excused. But fellow Christian, no! you are mistaken. It is as really your duty, to labor directly, specifically, for the spiritual good of your fellow men, as it is that of your ministers. You are not called to labor in all the same ways as he, but still the everlasting salvation of the souls of dying men, as truly concerns you, as it does him.

But you may say, I shall be going out of my place and I shall apparently be taking the work out of my minister's hands. This also is a mistake. You will be going directly into your place, and you will in this way, endear yourself to the heart of your minister, and he will thank God for your labors.

I will now state how you can do good.—I hope these directions will be treasured up in the memory of every communicant who reads them:

1. Be regular and punctual at church.

When a cloudy day, or a little mud or snow, or bad traveling, keeps our neighbors at home on the Sabbath, let your seat in the church be occupied. You do not know how much it gladdens the heart of your minister to find you there, after he has prepared his sermon with study and prayer, and now goes into church and beholds one and another, and another seat vacant. Your minister soon begins to feel that you are one on whom he can rely, to hold up his hands—while fair weather Christians are not to be depended on.—When the crowd are there, then they are there; but when they are wanted most, they mortify and dishearten him.

2. Labor directly to convert sinners.

To do this, you need not sound a trumpet before you, nor make a great noise.—But drop a word here and a word there.—Take some book like the two first volumes of "Religion of the Heart and Life," and put it into the hands of an impenitent friend. Seek some favorable opportunity, and kindly, prudently, and faithfully urge one or another, to secure without delay, the salvation of the soul, tell them that life is short,—that death is certain, that heaven is infinitely desirable, and hell infinitely dreadful; tell them to secure the one and avoid the other.

I wish to ask you a plain question. Is there not some impenitent person near you for whose salvation you never made one serious effort? Are you ready to meet that person at the bar of God? It may be, that that person is your own darling child—your son or your daughter. It may be, that you have taken the vows of God on you in its behalf at its baptism. If so, oh what awful responsibility rests on you!—Their salvation, or their ruin, may depend upon your faithfulness or unfaithfulness.—Think of this consideration seriously.

3. You can pray.

And this is a way to do good, at all times open before you. Pray for yourself—pray for your minister. St. Paul asked the prayers of private Christians. Pray for the impenitent sinners, that God would give them repentance. Pray for the Church.—Pray for the poor self-denying, toiling missionary of Jesus Christ, that he may have courage to fight on, until he wins the victor's crown. When you have prayed once—pray again, and not forget to look for an answer to your prayers. Did you ever think that it is mocking God, to pray and then not wait to receive?

I have here pointed out three ways in which you can do good. Your unfaithfulness will not be the result of ignorance.

PRIDE.

Some parents seem to delight to foster pride by appealing to a false principle of honor; and while they secretly minister fuel to the flame, by lauding the actions of the miscalled honorable man, they are working an almost irretrievable injury to their offspring. With others, popularity is everything, and to stand well in the opinion of the world is the grand aim of life. If any course is the fashionable one, this is enough in their eyes. It possesses the chief criterion of value for them. But the united head of a holy family will judge and act with far different views. The basis of all family government, discipline, and instruction with such, is fixed, where it ever should be, on the great principles of truth contained in the word of God. The directions and purposes there taught, are immeasurably superior to all the world can give. They have a weight and force which impart to them a sanction that the conscience cannot fail to acknowledge. A clear light shines out from those sacred pages on the path of duty, and the value of the trust delegated to every parent is most impressively presented. Reverence for the institutions of his appointment, for his holy Sabbath, his providence, his word, and all the means of grace—dear as these are to the heart, and allowed as they are to hold an influence over the actions—are earnestly and faithfully enforced. There are also things too often deemed trivial, but which in the forms they assume under direction of the parent's moral discipline may exert no small influence over the welfare of the child, and these we can not wholly pass over. We allude to the habits of economy punctuality, neatness, and the proper subordination of the various innocent propensities, by which by too great indulgence become injurious. To keep up the proper balance, and so to interweave those minor virtues with others of commanding aspect, requires the eye and mind ever to be awake and active; but it is the proper task of the parent, who should never be found shrinking from a duty so plain, and which will so surely meet its appropriate reward.—Chris. Family Magazine.

WHY THE CHURCH IS SO WEAK.

It is not because God has thus determined, for we may and should be strong in God and in the power of his might. But the great reason many Churches are so weak, is, the members do not all exercise the strength they have. In some churches, nine-tenths of the members are habitually idle, and, instead of helping and strengthening the Church, they weaken it. While two or three are engaged to promote the glory of God and the salvation of men, those who do nothing do often paralyze their efforts. Remember, Christian, what inspiration says, "He that gathereth not with us, scattereth abroad." There is no middle ground—you can either help, or you hinder. Your influence is either for Christ, or it is against him. Every member of the Church ought to be a lively member, and not a deadly member. But these dead branches are not only dead themselves, but their conduct tends directly to kill all who are around them. Let every one that bears the name of Christ depart from all iniquity, and then the Churches that are now saying, "My leanness, my leanness," may be like Mount Zion, that cannot be moved. Every branch that is in Christ must bring forth fruit, or the Father will take it away. I would as soon trust the eternal destiny of my soul on the doctrines of the Koran, as on that doctrine that teaches the ungodly backslider that he is on the road to heaven.

SOME THINGS I DON'T LIKE.

I don't like to see a professor of religion going to the Post Office on the Sabbath day. It is a violation of the fourth commandment.

I don't like to see Christians habitually neglecting the sick during the week, and visiting them on the Sabbath. It looks suspicious.

I don't like long prayers at our social meetings. They are not edifying.

I don't like to see people chewing tobacco in the church. It pollutes the Lord's house.

I don't like to see gentlemen put their hats on their heads before leaving the sanctuary. It would be more reverent to remain uncovered.

I don't like to see people turning the leaves of their hymn books at church, during the sermon. It is disrespectful to the minister.

I don't like our minister to keep the congregation waiting more than half an hour after the proper time for preaching. The people get impatient.

I don't like to subscribe for a newspaper and not pay for it. I always feel uncomfortable when I remember that I am sponging from the Editor.

I don't like to see a pious family without a religious newspaper. It is too great a privation.

I don't like a professor of religion to absent himself from the prayer meeting more than a year at a time. I fear he does not approbate them.—Pres Advocate.

FAMILY PRAYER.—In binding a family together in peace and love, there is no human influence like that of domestic prayer. Uniting them in a common object, it unites their sympathies and their desires. Raising their hearts to heaven, it brings them altogether in the presence of God.—The family altar is an asylum to which they repair from the care and toils of life. Reminding them of the rest reserved in heaven, it unites them in efforts of faith and obedience for its attainment. Earth has no holier spot than a house thus sanctified by prayer; where the voice of supplication and thanksgiving consecrates every day, where the word of God is devoutly read, and all unite to show forth all his praise. It may be humble, but it is holy, and, therefore, heavenly. Poverty may be there, and sorrow; but its inmates are rich in faith, and joyous in the Holy Ghost. Sickness and death may enter it; but they will come as angels of peace and mercy, and the spirits whom they release from the imprisonment of the flesh, shall be united, free, and happy, to worship forever, as earth did not permit them, a family in heaven.

EVERY DAY RELIGION.—This is the Theology of the Bible—"Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long," not merely during the devotions of morning and evening, or when a friend converses with you upon the subject of religion, but constantly, "all the day long." This religion must be a habit—not merely an ornament to throw on at particular times, when circumstances seem to demand it—but the daily and hourly attire of life. Many professors of religion as soon as Sabbath is over, and the daily periodical worship of the family is performed, throw over them the costume of the world, and so completely conceal the garments of righteousness, that they can mingle with the world in all the busy transactions of life, from day to day, from Sabbath to Sabbath, and the world not know that they are citizens of another country. There is a despicable deception about this, unworthy the character of a citizen of Heaven. Are they ashamed of their royal robes, and yet good citizens of the heavenly kingdom? This cannot be. No true subject will be ashamed of the costume of the royal court.

From the Christian Reflector

THE DESIGN OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The Lord's Supper seems to have been instituted as a standing and permanent memorial of what Christ has done for us by his atonement for our sins. The Savior knew that amidst the cares of the world, there would be a tendency to forget him even by his friends, certainly by his enemies.—The institution of this ordinance reminds us of a Savior's death, and the blessings which flow from it. "This do in remembrance of me," says Christ when he instituted it. This is his last and dying bequest, and one would suppose this fact would endear it to the heart of every disciple. But alas! how many neglect to comply with this command for the most trivial reasons. They seem to care more for their feelings, self-will, or unsubdued temper, than the command of Christ. If any difference of opinion occur between themselves and others, small though it may be, without any labor or effort on their part to effect a reconciliation, they keep away from the communion table! In this way they expect to show a proper resentment towards their offending brother and perhaps towards the whole church! thus refusing to obey Christ, who has bought them, in partaking of the symbols of his broken body and shed blood, to gratify a feeling which to say the least is wrong. What shall we say of such conduct? It is quite a common thing for some in our churches who make much difficulty, and create much pain in the church to which they belong. Shall we call them weak brethren, and attribute it to their ignorance? This will not always do. Are they not "disobedient" and unruly?" Do they exhibit the spirit of Christ? Suppose their cause of grief is real, ought they not to take the proper steps for a reconciliation? and is another's sin any reason why I should disobey my dying Redeemer in this his last request? Surely not. When will this evil be corrected, and all the disciples have correct views upon it? We hope it will receive further attention. ALPHA.

TRIFLING WITH SCRIPTURE.—It is of the greatest importance that we should resist the temptation, frequently so strong, of annexing a familiar, facetious, or irreverent idea to a scriptural usage, a scriptural expression, a scripture text, or a scripture name. Nor should we hold ourselves guiltless, though we may have been misled by mere negligence, or want of reflection. Every person of good taste will avoid reading a parody of a beautiful poem, because the recollection of the degraded likeness will always obtrude itself upon our memories, when we wish to derive pleasure from the contemplation of the elegance of the original. But how much more urgent is the duty by which we are bound to keep the pages of the Bible clear of any impression tending to diminish the blessing of habitual respect and reverence towards our Maker's law.—Palgrave.

THE CONFIDENCE OF A CHRISTIAN.—The righteous seem to lie by, in the bosom of the earth, as a weary pilot in some well sheltered creek, till all the storms which infest this lower world are blown over.—Here they enjoy safe anchorage, are in no danger of foundering amidst the waves of prevailing iniquity, or of being shipwrecked on the rocks of any powerful temptation. But ere long we shall behold them hoisting their flag of hope, riding before a sweet gale of atoning merit and redeeming love, till they make, with all the sails of an assured faith, the blessed port of an eternal life.—Rev. H. Harvey.

Charles Simmons once asked Emmons the secret of popular preaching. The reply was—never to disturb consciences!

THE DANGER OF AN EVIL ADVISER.

A DIALOGUE.

Thomas. What's your hurry, Frank? Stop a minute.

Frank. I can't stay! Father sent me with this letter to the railroad depot.

T. Well,—the depot won't run away.

F. But the cars will; there's a gentleman going to New York, he promised to carry this letter, and there's money in it for my brother.

T. But don't you see it's but ten minutes past three, and the cars don't start till four, and you have time enough for what I want of you.

F. Well, what do you want?

T. Just step in here to see the wild beasts with me; you have never been, have you?

F. No; I'll go when I come back from my errand.

T. No you can't, for it will be time to go to the writing master.

F. Then I'll go with you to-morrow.

T. No, you can't for this is the last day of the exhibition.

F. Is it? that's bad! I did not know that there were any beasts in town till to-day.—How many are there?

T. Ever so many; there is a polar bear, and an elephant, and a most beautiful rhinocerous.

F. I have seen a rhinocerous and he is the ugliest creature that ever was; his skin sits as loosely upon him as a sailor's trowsers.

T. Well, there's a royal tiger—

F. Is there? I never saw a royal tiger!

T. O! he's a beauty—all yellow and covered with black stripes. Then there are little leopards playing just like kittens; and—there! there! do you hear that? there's the lion roaring!

F. Whew! that's a peeler! How long will it take to see them all?

T. O! not half an hour, and it won't take you five minutes to run down to the depot afterwards, if you clip it like a good fellow.

F. Are there any monkeys?

T. Plenty of them! the funniest monkeys you ever saw; they make all sorts of faces.

F. Well,—I don't know—what if I should be too late for the cars?

T. No danger of that, I tell you; the town clock up there is too fast; it's all out of order; and besides, you might see half the beasts while you are standing here thinking about it, looking up the street and down the street.

F. Well! come along then; where's your money?

T. O! I don't pay! I got acquainted with the door keeper after I had been here twice, and now he lets me in for nothing every time I bring a feller that does pay.

F. O ho! well, I suppose its a quarter of a dollar, and I have one somewhere in my pockets. (Pulling out his handkerchief to search for the money, drops the letter.)—Ah! here it is! Come Tom! no time to be lost. Mind you do not let me stay too long.

They go into the exhibition booth. Frank's father, passing along, picks up the letter, examines it, looks around for Frank, and passes hastily away. After some time the boys come out.

T. You did not half see them, you were in such a hurry and worry.

F. I know it. Are you sure that clock is too fast, Tom?

T. I don't know—I suppose so—the clocks are wrong half the time.

F. Why, you told me it was too fast, Tom! and now I'll bet anything I shall be too late! I wish I hadn't gone in!

T. Well, why don't you move then?—What are you rummaging after?

F. Why, after my letter. I'm sure I put it in this pocket. What in the name of wonder has become of it?

T. Look in t'other pocket.

F. It is'nt there! nor in my hat! what shall I do?

T. Why, you can't have lost it, can you?

F. I have lost it, I am sure as can be.—I had it in this very pocket just before I met you, and now it's gone!

T. May be somebody stole it in the crowd?

F. That's comfort! There was ever so much money in it, for I heard father talking about it at dinner time.

T. O! I'll tell you what's become of it!

F. What? what?

T. Why I guess the elephant took it out of your pocket!

F. You ought to be ashamed to stand there laughing, after you have got me into such a scrape! I have a great mind to go in again and look all around.

T. They won't let you go in again unless you pay.

F. O Tom, what will my father say to me? Where shall I look? I wish I had never heard of the beasts; there was no comfort in looking at them, for I was thinking of the cars all the time, and now my letter is gone, and brother Henry's money, and all; and what will father do to me?

T. What's the use of telling him any thing about it? He'll never know whether the letter went or not, if you don't say a word.

F. Yes he will; my brother will write to inquire for the money.

T. Well, and can't you say you gave the letter to the gentleman?

F. No, Tom; I can't do that. I can't tell a lie, and, above all, to my father.

T. The more fool you! You need'nt look so mad about it. There's your father coming now! Run and tell him quick, and get a whipping!

F. He will punish me, Tom; that he will. What shall I do?

T. Take my advice; I'll tell a fib for you, and do you hold to it.

F. I never told a lie in my life, Tom!

T. Then its high time you did; you'll have to tell a good many before you die.

F. I don't believe that.

T. Well, here's your father. Now see how I'll get you out of the scrape. That's right! keep staring up at the hand-bill on the wall.

(Enter Father.)

Father. Why, Frank, you have run yourself out of breath; I trust that letter will go safely, for your brother wants the money very much.

T. Frank was just in time, sir. The cars were just starting.

Father. O! you went with him, did you?

T. Yes, sir, and I saw the gentleman put the letter in his pocket book very carefully. I fancy it will go safe enough.

Father. I fancy it will. What is in that handbill, Frank, that interests you so much?

F. I don't know sir.

Father. What's the matter, my boy?

F. I can't stand it, father! I can't stand it! I had rather take ten whippings, Tom, any day, than—than—

Father. Ho, ho! what is all this?

T. You are a fool, Frank.

F. I know I am a fool; but I can't tell a lie. I lost the letter, father; I went to see the wild beasts with Tom, and lost the letter!

Father. And this pernicious fellow wanted you to deceive me about it, did he?

T. Why, I thought—

Father. Frank! I would willingly lose a dozen letters with ten times as much money in them, for the pleasure of finding you resist the temptation! Come here, my boy, and leave off crying. I found the letter and carried it myself to the depot in time for the cars; I can forgive you your folly,—since it has not ended in wickedness! but remember one thing, I shall not forgive you, if hence-forward you associate with this unprincipled boy. Begone, sir! I am glad to see shame in your face. Had my boy taken your advice, he, too, would have been at this moment a dejected, conscience smitten, despised liar; but he is holding up his head, and his heart is right in his bosom. You are the very boy, Thomas, whom I was requested to take into my employment; but I will have nothing to do with you. Never come near my son again!—The Third Reader.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, April 6, 1842.

The Christian not of this World.

The Savior has emphatically declared this of his disciples, that they are not of this world. They are born by a celestial birth—partake of the Divine nature, and are heirs to a heavenly inheritance. When the storms of life beat heavily, and the tide of adversity sets in—when friend after friend fails, and the enemy comes in like a flood, then this language comes as sweet consolation to the weary pilgrim, and buoys up his fainting soul with the soul-enlivening fact that this world is not his home, and that his treasure is in heaven. Alas! how drear, how desolate this vain world without the consolation of the words of Jesus. Temptation may awhile assail, sickness and pain may afflict, disappointment and blighted hopes annoy, but none of these, or the thousand ills that embitter life, can essentially detract aught from the rich fund of the christian's enjoyment. He is not of this world—his affections are not on it—his treasure is not in it, nor is it of any service to him except as a probationary state.

Man has a thousand admonitions to remind him of his mortality, and warn him to prepare to meet his God. Almost every breeze bears along the tolling knell of death. At every step dangers stand thick, and every pulse is beating a funeral march to the grave.

This language of Jesus is worthy of more than a passing notice. Christians are not of this world, because Christ has redeemed them from it. It is true, that as probationers, they must awhile be encumbered with their clay, but they are essentially the children of the kingdom, and have no right to degrade themselves by worldly-mindedness, even though in this they might find amusement. The disposition, the feelings, the hopes, the aspirations are heavenly, and nought but heaven, with all its joys can satisfy his heaven-born desires. The soul regenerated by the grace of the Gospel, in its nature and characteristics is elevated far above the grovelling sensualities of the world. In a manner divested of its impurities and infirmities, it soars above the tumultuous cares and perplexities that ever clog and defile the sinful soul.

Christians are required to keep themselves unspotted from the world. It would be degrading to the Christian to so far forget his reponsibilities as a member of Christ's kingdom as to stoop to please himself with the vanities of time, or have his mind occupied with the things of earth.—Shall he who is not of this world spend all his energies, and devote his time for worldly purposes? So far as he can act for the interests of Christ's kingdom, may the christian act; beyond this he may not dare go. He has no other business here but to prepare himself for his heavenly inheritance.

Sabbath Sanctification.

At the creation, God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it. At Mt. Sinai, in giving the law, he commands to "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." God, speaking by Isaiah the Prophet, admonishes the Israelites to call the Sabbath a delight. The Savior speaking of it says, the Sabbath was made for man. Thus it is manifest that the Sabbath is time-sanctified by God, which men are to keep holy. There are six days in which work may be done, but the Sabbath must not be secularised. The fiat of Jehovah has fixed unalterably the manner in which the day is to be kept. It is sinful not to observe the time God has commanded.—It is also sinful not to regard it in a proper manner. It has long been a question, what is lawful or unlawful to be done on the Sabbath day. It is agreed that all things are improper except works of necessity or mercy. Men are prone, however, to add to or take from this list as their worldly-mindedness or spirituality abounds. The cold-hearted professor thinks it necessary to do many things that the spiritual man will not allow. There is but little danger of making the number of things that may be done on the Sabbath too small. To enjoy the Sabbath the soul must be as much taken from earthly things as possible, and intently fixed on God. The chief blessings of the Sabbath are in communion with God, and this abounds in proportion as other things are banished from the thoughts. The world and the Holy Spirit cannot occupy the heart at the same time. If the hands are engaged the mind must necessarily be engaged in like manner. All things therefore that divert the mind from communion with God should be avoided.

We wish to mention a few things that are a desecration of the Sabbath, and tend perhaps more than all others to lessen the good that should ever be derived from the Sabbath.

1. Improper Conversation. The plea of mercy or necessity can not be urged for this. No one is obliged to talk of his worldly interest or of his neighbor's character or interests or of business transactions, or of common affairs on the Sabbath. Every worldly matter may be laid aside. The things of the kingdom and the story of the cross possess infinite more interest than all things else. If these do not sufficiently interest the mind as to make them the theme of conversation, it is because there is no love to God in the heart. Improper conversation tends directly to draw the attention from the duties and pleasures of the Sabbath, and every way unfits the mind for communion with God. It is therefore a desecration of the Sabbath to make worldly matters, or aught save the interest of religion, the theme of conversation.

2. Improper Reading. All reading on the Sabbath is improper, save such as is calculated to direct the mind to heavenly things. The news of the day, scientific and literary works, tales of the fancy and miscellaneous works, lead the mind away from communion with God. The Bible is emphatically the Book of Books, and ought not simply on the Sabbath but at all times to have the preference. Besides this there are Books and other writings that have a direct religious tendency. If the bible and religious books fail to interest the mind, it is because religion has no home in the heart. A worldly depraved mind only prefers other things to those. The sublime truths of the gospel will never fail to interest the pious soul.

3. Improper Thoughts. It may be impossible to have have such a command of the thoughts as to prevent them from straying. But they can easily be recalled. It is vain to worship God with the tongue while vain thoughts possess the heart. It is perhaps natural for the mind to turn to the things that occupy it during the week. And also to give loose to the imagination and let it rove wherever it will; but unless the thoughts are restrained and turned to heavenly things, it avails but little to attend to the outward forms of religion. If the thoughts of the heart are impure, and God is not in them all, if the cares of this world or the vanities of life possess the mind, there is no communion with God, and the blessings of the Sabbath are lost. The interests of the soul and the rich importance of the gospel, are themes rich enough to ravish the soul and fill it with sublime contemplations.

4. Sauntering or Lounging. A very common way of spending the Sabbath with some is, to give themselves up to dozing, or wandering from place to place. Nothing is more plain than that spent in this way the Sabbath losses all its interests. There can be no communion with God when drowsiness or ennui has dominion over the mind, or when it is necessary, for diversion, to wander from one place to another. The mind does not require entire relaxation, neither does the body; they can be sufficiently restored without giving them up to drowsiness or sleep. The house of God is the most unfit place of all to doze—the place, the occasion, and the exercises, are full of interest, or should be so. In fine, the Sabbath in all its exercises, is designed for a contemplation of the great interests of religion.—The mind with all its forces should be divested from worldly cares and thoughts, and centered on God.

Come to School.

The winter term in De Ruyter Institute closes to day. The summer term will commence on the 6th of May. No pains will be spared to render the stay of students here as pleasant and profitable as possible. And we trust no parent will have occasion to regret sending their children to this school. We have frequently mentioned that this Institute presents rare facilities for mental culture, and that a good moral influence will be exerted over students.

The Trustees have resolved with the next term to open a primary department. Arrangements have been made or will be, to secure a Teacher every way well qualified for the place. Terms in this department very low. The Trustees hope their efforts in this department will be appreciated and that there will be no lack of students.

The boarding house will be occupied by John R. Butts, where students can find accomodations to their minds at the published prices, viz: $1,25 per week, including lodging or washing, or $1,38 including both.

Will the stockholders and friends of the Institute exert themselves a little to send students here, and give the assurance that Trustees and teachers will do their best for them while they are in school?

Congressional.

We occupy considerable space this week with Congressional proceedings. The case of Mr. Giddings is an unusual one, and all will doubtless be anxious to know the whole of the matter. Read and judge for yourselves.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

[illegible] is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists from their origin to the present [illegible], giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

Missionary Agent.

To the eastern churches and others who may be directly interested, Brother Sherman S. Griswold, an evangelist minister in this church, (Piscataway,) has been appointed a missionary and agent by the Executive Committee of the Missionary Society, to travel and preach the gospel and collect funds for the benefit of the Society, that the gospel may be sent to the destitute churches, and settlements where our brethren may be located. His journey and labors will be through New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Rensselaer county, &c., and as his mission is one of great moment, he hopes that as the time allotted him is short, that the people will be in readiness when he comes among them, to assist him in his noble enterprize—especially the ministers, that he may accomplish much in a short time, and that his efforts may bring a new era among us upon the subject of missions. And as Mr. Griswold is a stranger in the denomination, we would say, that we think him fully competent for the duty assigned him, and hope that he will receive that hearty reception with ministers and people where he may travel that his station and calling demands.

Our Obligations to Lead the Reformed Inebriates to Christ.

The present aspect of the temperance reform, vastly augments the responsibilities of Christians. Thousands of warm hearted "Washingtonians" stand waiting for explicit instruction in the fundamental principles of the gospel. Our hand finds delightful work to do, and we should do it with our might. With all our weight of love for Christ, and confidence in the promises of God, and in the special renovating agency of the Holy Spirit—we must proclaim to those reformed men, salvation through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.—Unless this great truth reaches their hearts, they will fail to avail themselves of the strongest preventative to save them from returning to their cups. True, they can unanimously say in the language of the Hon. Thomas F. Marshall, of Kentucky,—"there is peculiar strength in the tie of honor that now publicly binds us." But such powerful temptations assail our reformed friends, and with such malignant inspection does the old arch enemy of all reform now watch them, that strong as the tie is that now publicly binds them, it needs to be made stronger by the purifying and all-controling influence of experimental religion. If without becoming Christians they may be saved from relapse, yet it is certain that if they experience not this radical change they can never enter heaven. We must tell them this in as plain words as the English language can furnish. Our beloved friends are in great danger of imagining that their successful efforts for self-reform, merit in some degree the blessings of salvation from the hand of God.—They are also in danger of supposing that the reform in which they now rejoice, and which has caused their wives and children and all around them to leap for joy, is the change of heart of which the Bible requires. False teachers will strengthen these delusive impressions. Satan, acting on his scheme of infernal reprisals, will seize on this opportunity to do his worst, that by fostering self-righteousness, he may lead those souls down to hell whom he failed of decoying there by the intoxicating beverage. But few reformed inebriates understand much about these exposures.—Those of us who do understand them, must approach these friends, and invite them to trust in Jesus, manifesting to them as much earnestness, and love, as they saw in those who succeeded in obtaining their names for the pledge. The ministers of the gospel should now make redemption through the blood of Christ, as prominent a theme as Paul makes it in his epistle to the Hebrews. It has always been our duty to give peculiar prominency to this subject; but the present aspects of the temperance reform, call upon us to proclaim more fully, more frequently, and more earnestly than ever, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission:" that there is no salvation for fallen man, without faith in the Son of God who "hath an unchangeable priesthood," and who is, therefore, "able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

ARRIVAL OF THE COLUMBIA.

By the arrival of the Columbia at Halifax, and the Unicorn at Boston from Halifax, bringing the passengers and papers of the Columbia, we have news from Europe up to the 4th inst.

House of Parliament—The Corn Laws.

The principal debates in Parliament have been upon the Corn Laws. In the House of Commons, on the 18th ult., the debate upon Mr. Villiers amendment to Sir Robert Peel's motion regarding the Corn Laws, for the abolition of all duties payable upon imported grain, was commenced and continued during five days. On a division, there appeared for the motion 393, for the amendment 90—majority against the amendment 303. On Friday, the 25th ult., Mr. Christopher moved an amendment, the effect of which was to give more complete protection to the farmer, by fixing a higher sliding scale than the measure of Sir Robert Peel. This proposal was withdrawn, and the House affirmed Sir Robert Peel's motion by a majority of 202, the numbers being 306 and 104. A long discussion took place on the resolution regulating the proposed duty upon imported wheat and flour. The report of the Committee on the importation of foreign corn was then agreed to.

Sixteen ships, amounting to 10,092 tons, have been engaged by the government for conveyance of troops to China.

Congressional News.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

Washington, March 28.

Messrs. Editors:—The unexpected result of the assault upon the rights of members, and the liberty of speech, in the person of Mr. Giddings, is a sufficient reason to justify a more extended notice of it, though I will endeavor to compress the whole into as narrow limits as possible.—The reflecting people, who compose the mass of your readers, should know the whole of the pretext, on which the minions of American despotism have cut down the second great right guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen. First, the right of petition was destroyed. Now the freedom of speech has shared the same fate. The nation must learn the lesson taught by the venerable Judge Mattocks, of Vt., who, on a petition day, some months ago, said, "Mr. Speaker, I have in my hands the petitions of several thousands of my fellow citizens, for important objects. If this was the Temple of Liberty, I should offer them; but as it is Slavery's Hall, I shall not do it." There must be, in a word, a resort to the primary assemblies, and the moral power of a purified and Christian press, as the only modes now left to vindicate the lost rights of an insulted people.

Let intelligent men of all parties, weigh well the sentiments and logic of the following, which were the resolves offered by Mr. Giddings. Let the reader bear in mind several things. First, that they are no hasty product of a fanatic's brain, but came from a man pre-eminently prudent, judicious, careful; a man thoroughly versed in the common and international law. Second, that so far as they related to the controversy between the U. S. and Great Britain, they embody the principles of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Amistad and Mississippi cases. Third, that such men as Conway Robinson, the first lawyer of the Virginia Bar, David Hoffman, Esq., of Baltimore, John Quincy Adams, several of the members of the Cabinet, and others, equally eminent, concur generally in their correctness. Respecting the other features of these resolutions let freemen judge. The presentation of these resolves will be a marked era in our history. They are as follows:

Resolutions offered by Mr. Giddings.

Resolved, That prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, each of the several States composing this Union exercised full and exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of slavery within its own territory, and possessed full power to continue or abolish it at pleasure.

Resolved, That by adopting the Constitution no part of the aforesaid powers were delegated to the Federal Government, but were reserved by and still pertain to each of the several States.

Resolved, That by the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, each of the several States surrendered to the Federal Government all jurisdiction over the subjects of commerce and navigation upon the high seas.

Resolved, That slavery being an abridgment of the natural rights of man, can exist only by force of positive municipal law, and is necessarily confined to the territorial jurisdiction of the power creating it.

Resolved, That when a ship belonging to the citizens of any State of this Union leaves the waters and territory of such State, and enters upon the high seas, the persons on board cease to be subject to the slave laws of such State, and thenceforth are governed in their relations to each other by, and are amenable to, the laws of the United States.

Resolved, That when the brig Creole, on her late passage for New-Orleans, left the territorial jurisdiction of Virginia, the slave laws of that State ceased to have jurisdiction over the persons on board said brig, and such persons became amenable only to the laws of the United States.

Resolved, That the persons on board said ship, in resuming their natural rights of personal liberty, violated no law of the United States, incurred no legal penalty, and are justly liable to no punishment.

Resolved, That all attempts to regain possession of, or to re-enslave said persons, are unauthorized by the Constitution or laws of the United States, and are incompatible with our national honor.

Resolved, That all attempts to exert our national influence in favor of the coastwise slave trade, or to place this nation in the attitude of maintaining a "commerce in human beings," are subversive of the rights and injurious to the feelings and the interest of the free States, and unauthorized by the Constitution, and prejudicial to our national character.

It will occur to many readers that these resolves simply reverse the propositions of Calhoun's resolves in the Senate, two years since, in the Comet and Encomium cases, which involved essentially the same principles, which then passed during the pendency of the negotiation; which is one of the reasons given to justify the outrage upon Mr. Giddings.

In my last letter, I stated that Mr. Botts, not being entitled to the floor, did not succeed in getting his preamble and resolve before the House. This was done by John B. Weller, of Ohio, (let his name stand with Aaron Burr, John Smith, Charles G. Atherton, and Benedict Arnold.) who offered the resolves as written by the Virginia slaveholder. The House adjourned pending a motion to overrule the decision of the Chair, that Mr. Giddings could not be deprived of his right to defend himself, by the operation of the P. Q. or any other rule or order; as it was a question of parliamentary privilege, and therefore, of absolute right. Now let your readers examine the preamble, and see if the reasons assigned for censuring Mr. Giddings, are not, of all others—except the last one—the reasons why the subject should have been brought forward, by some prudent man, like himself, for future and deliberate examination. The last reason is a new assumption, contrary to fact, that any law of the United States denounces the conduct of the Creole men as "mutiny," or "murder." The resolves do not "justify" them, save by the assertion of what none but a fanatic would deny, viz: that slavery is a violation of natural justice.

Whereas, Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, the Member from the Sixteenth Congressional District of the State of Ohio, has this day presented to this House a series of Resolutions touching the most important interests connected with a large portion of the Union, now a subject of negotiation between the United States and Great Britain of the most delicate nature, the result of which may eventually involve those nations, and, perhaps, the whole civilized world in war; and, whereas, it is the duty of every good citizen, and particularly of every selected agent and representative of the People, to discountenance all efforts to create excitement, dissatisfaction and division among the People of the United States at such a time and under such circumstances, which is the only effect to be accomplished by the introduction of sentiments before the legislative body of the country hostile to the grounds assumed by the high functionary having charge of this important and delicate trust: and, whereas, mutiny and murder are therein justified and approved in terms shocking to all sense of law, order, and humanity; therefore—

Resolved, That this House hold the conduct of the said Member as altogether unwarranted and unwarrantable, and deserving the severe condemnation of the People of this country, and of this body in particular.

Monday night, a caucus, or consultation among the Southern leaders was held, and the result appeared in their conduct the next day. After the journal was read, the decision of the Chair, so plainly right, was reversed 77 to 98, and the main question of the adoption of the resolves ordered, 95 to 91. A long and noisy struggle followed, to get as a matter of right, or give, as a matter of favor, to Mr. Giddings a chance to defend himself. Twenty times at least, he rose to get the floor, but in every instance the efforts of himself and others to get it for him were overruled by the chair, or by the objections of some slaveholding member, who insisted on the decision of the House just made, to order the main question which precludes debate. A motion to lay on the table, made by Mr. Adams, was rejected 70 to 124. Several members now desired to be excused from voting. Brown, of Tenn., because "it might look like persecution," and "it would do no good to condemn a man so lost to his country's honor, and his own, as to offer such resolves!" Cushing, of Mass., and Irwin, of Pa., because they feared their votes might be construed as favoring the resolves, and they utterly denied the right of the House to censure any member for his opinions on any subject. They were not excused. The vote on the resolves was 125 to 69, and on the preamble, 119 to 66.—Wise, of Va., refused to vote at all, perhaps because they came from Botts, his enemy.

The following was the vote:

	Voted to Cen.	Against.	Ab't.	Tot.
Free State Whigs,	7	58	20	85
Do. Democrats,	38	7	8	54
Slave State Whigs,	38	2	10	50
Do. Democrats,	40	0	7	47
Tyler men,	2	2	2	6
Total.	125	69	48	242

Mr. Giddings immediately rose, quietly passed round the House, and bade farewell to his friends, some of whom, and especially the venerable ex-President, were much affected; and then left the Hall, accompanied by the Whig members of the Ohio delegation. The triumphant faces of the majority were sobered at once by this decisive step. The mildness and gentleness of his manners, probably led many to think lightly of the decision of his character.—Few men are more decided, or energetic when the call of duty is made. Besides, it made the egregious blunder of sending one of the most vigorous intellects in the House, a man of some fifty years of age, with grey hairs, and great weight of character to the polls, with the tale of the destruction of freedom of speech by slaveholders and their servile allies, very manifest to the most obtuse brain. The especial folly seemed greater when they remembered his election in 1840, by a majority of nearly 5,000, (being about five times the whole number of legal votes in Mr. Wise's District, or Mr. Pickens'!) so that his triumphant re-election could not be doubted. Perhaps, the idea that the most popular and talented democratic member from the West, Weller, has been foolishly compromised by his representing a District full of abolitionists, and having been elected by barely fifty majority, did not sweeten the pill to the democratic part of the majority. Indeed, their curses at his and their folly since, have been both deep and loud. After Mr. G. retired, the Loan Bill was taken up, as it was a short time the next day; but nobody paid any attention to who spoke, or what they said, except the reporters for the city papers. Three and a half hours of Wednesday were taken up, chiefly in efforts to amend the Journal in reference to the case. The main struggle related to this issue; did Mr. Giddings have any chance to defend himself in order? If he had, it might palliate, but could not justify the vote of censure. It was clearly shown that he had no chance, as a matter of right. And, when consent had been supposed to be given, he rose to say that he never would consent to defend himself as a mere matter of grace and favor, thus yielding up his Constitutional rights, and those of the people he represented; it appeared that Cooper, of Georgia, objected to his going on before he had completed one single sentence! So without a hearing, a member was censured, and VIRTUALLY expelled from the House, for laying before the House his views on a question of great public interest, for their examination at some future day.

Barnard, of Albany, on Tuesday, gave notice of a protest against the vote of the House, which he has drawn up with great ability, and which will probably receive 75 signatures. The excitement of the Northern members has been very great. Friday morning, Everett, of Vt., Barnard, Winthrop, and Saltonstall, of Mass., Brockway, of Conn, and several others of the most respected men in the House—not abolitionists—called a meeting of all the Whigs from the free States to consider the protest, and any other measure necessary to resist the encroachments of the slave power. Another meeting is contemplated to embrace all who voted, or who sympathize with the minority. Mr. Adams, on Thursday, tried to bring in a rule that hereafter no member should be censured unheard; and the next morning, Calvary Morris, on behalf of the Ohio members, offered a similar resolve, virtually rescinding the vote of censure; but neither was received under the rules. That morning Mr. Giddings left for Ohio. The people will send him back about the middle of May. Such is the history of this most extraordinary proceeding. Well might a Western member recall the fact that such votes of censure preceded the guillotine only 12 months, in France, in 1792. Well did Mr. Adams declare that the spirit of liberty had no existence in a slaveholding community: all pretenses to it were hypocrisy. For let us not be blind to the wide-spread demoralization of the people, or to the fact that slavery is the ruling power in this republic. Yet will this mad act of these poor men, like the slaveholder's movement in Maryland, and the assault upon Mr. Adams, prove to have been an important part of the providential instrumentalities for the overthrow of the whole system of slavery. And while we cannot "rejoice in iniquity," or that it occurs, we may rejoice that God will make it the occasion of a display of his power and goodness.

One remark in concluding this topic.—One of your city dailies is trying to make it appear that slavery had nothing to do with the vote to censure Mr. Giddings! Rayner, of N. C., to-day, in a violent speech, took occasion fully to justify all the grounds taken by Mr. Giddings as to the points at issue between us and England. With him, and all Southern men, it was slavery, and nothing else. Their defendant in New York, (the Courier,) therefore raises a false issue. But there is little danger that the people will be deceived as to so plain a case.

News of the Day.

IMPORTANT FROM TEXAS—THE REPUBLIC INVADED.

The New-Orleans papers of the 16th bring the important intelligence that the Rio Grande has actually crossed, and Texas invaded by 14,000 troops under Arista. A letter in the Picayune, dated at Galveston, March 12th, says that San Antonio, Goliad, and Victoria, have been taken without oposition. It was thought that the first battle would be fought on the Colorado.

The letter says:—

"The country is in arms—some 4,000 of our people, it is estimated, are on the march for the scene of action. Houston turned out several hundred—about 100 left here to-day, and some two or three hundred more will follow in the course of a day or two. The President, who is here, is opposed to this movement on the part of the citizens of this place; he thinks that all should remain here for the protection of this, the most important point in the Republic, and a few of the more prudent part of community concur with him."

No attempt, at the latest dates, had been made on Austin. Gen. Johnson had gone thither with about 100 men, and about 500 had marched from Houston. It was thought that Gen. Burleson has concentrated nearly 2000 men on the Colorado.

The people of Galveston are said to be almost constantly assembled, devising ways and means to repel the enemy. All are rejoiced that he has come, and they say that they are determined the invading army shall lead them back to Mexico. The steamer Lafitte, mounting 5 guns, with 60 men, under Capt. Wade, and two tenders, was to leave for Copano, and thence according to discretion. An armed brig is also to go out to intercept transports with supplies for the enemy. For this $3000 in money and provisions were raised on the spot. It is intended to appeal to the citizens of the United States for aid.

The Galveston Civilian says that Goliad was taken by 42 Mexicans. Capt. Ferguson, of the Texas army, reached Victoria on the 7th, saying that he had been captured by 300 Mexican cavalry, and had made his escape from them. There were 150 men under arms at Victoria, expecting an attack.

San Antonio was taken by about 1,000 Mexicans under Gen. Vasquez. All the Mexicans in Bexar have joined the invading army. The New Orleans Bee says that if necessary, Gen. Houston can have 10,000 Texans in the field within 30 days. A deputation from Galveston has arrived at New Orleans to procure aid.

The Bee says that the orders of Gen. Houston are, to plant the Texan flag at San Iago, and then take Matamoras.

Gen. Houston left Galveston on the 13th, to join the army in person. He has published the following proclamation:—

"To the Citizens of Texas:—

MY COUNTRYMEN—Rumors having been brought from the Southwestern frontier of invasion. Particulars have been furnished to the Executive. The facts are sufficient to justify immediate preparations for defensive war. All who are subject to military duty are commanded to be in readiness to repair, equipped, to the scene of action, at the call of the authorities of the country. It is ordered that the Colonel of each county, for the present, lay off the county into company beats, and direct the election of Captains and Subalterns, and arrange the members of each company in three classes, agreeably to the class in which they draw. When drafts may take place, the Colonels of the different counties shall have authority and power to accept efficient substitutes into service.

Each man will be required, in the event of a call by the President, to report himself furnished with good arms, eight days' provision, one hundred rounds of ammunition, and prepared for three months' service from the time when they may report at the Head Quarters of the Army.

In the event of a formidable invasion, it is needless to appeal to the patriotism and valor of the Texans. They have won liberty and independence by their undaunted heroism—they have enjoyed the blessings of freedom—they are proud of their national character!

If invasion should press upon us, we are required by every sacred obligation to family, friends and country, to repel our invaders with discomfiture and dismay. If war should come upon us we will make it our business. We will be authorized to meet and pursue our enemies with vengeance! They have forgotten the generosity with which they were treated when they were placed at the footstool of Texan mercy! They were saved when even humanity would have justified retributive vengeance! Should Mexico again disregard the exalted principles of civilized and honorable warfare, they shall feel that avenging arm that shall take of them full recompense for oppression and cruelty! Texans can and will be free! They would prefer death to degradation, or the loss of their independence. SAM. HOUSTON."

Galveston, March 10th, 1842.

President Houston has addressed a letter to the Texan Consul at New Orleans, asking him to make known, that if any should choose to emigrate to Texas, they must come well armed, as otherwise they would only encumber the country. No less than 56, in companies well organized, will be received.

In consequence of the inroads of the temperance societies upon the interests of the class engaged in making and vending intoxicating drinks, the brewers and grocers of Canton, Ohio, have formed a league and resolved to sell no yeast to temperance people.

There have been 429 applications for bankruptcy in Connecticut.

A large brick block on Main st., Rochester, occupied by stores, was discovered to be on fire, on the 21st. The flames were extinguished before they had done much injury, but a probable loss of some $30,000 was experienced from the water.

Official notice has been given in the Madisonian, that the contemplated 10 per cent. reduction on the commissions of all postmasters, will not take place till April 1st.

It is rumored that the Secretary of the Navy has ordered or is about to order the Vandalia, and three other vessels of war to cruise on the coast of Africa, to be under the command of Capt. Ramsay.

New Orleans has 333 grog shops, of different grades, paying for licenses $198,100. Their cost to the city is estimated by the Bee at $2,200,000!

Incendiaries are very busy among the barns and other buildings at Newark, N. J. They are believed to be a set of desperately bad boys.

There were in the State Prison at Sing Sing, on the 24th inst., 761 male convicts, and 76 females; total, 837.

Pugh & Alvord's large pork establishment in Cincinnati, was partially burnt on the 10th inst., with some 4 or 5,000 kegs of lard.

The N. Y. Court of Errors have determined to hold a special session in N. Y. city, commencing on the 4th of June.

The authorities of New Orleans cause poisoned sausages to be distributed in the streets, for the benefit of dogs generally, and of rabidly disposed ones in particular.

When one of the Paixhan cannon, (64 pounders,) recently tried at South Boston, burst, the ball took a direction to one side, knocking over one gun, and injuring another, and passing within three feet of a fool who was showing his courage by exposing himself.

A woman, about fifty years of age, was found dead at Elizabethtown, N. J., a few days since. A bottle, which had contained laudanum, was by her side. She had picked out her name from her linen, and written on a piece of paper—"I have not a relative on earth. You need not advertise me; I am not known. I am from the country."

A new tax bill has been introduced in the Legislature of Virginia. By it, the tax on lotteries is increased from $500 to $1000; pianos, $2; gold watches, $1; silver watches, 25 cents.

The villains who knocked down and robbed Mr. Nicholson at Baltimore have been arrested, and $3,700 of the money recovered.

Government has resolved to have some heavy ordnance manufactured at Pittsburg during the coming summer. One hundred 22 pounders, and a quantity of balls, are already contracted for.

Captain Francis Dawson died last Sunday in Boston. He crossed the Atlantic one hundred and sixty-two times, made seven voyages to China, and three to Calcutta. Three times he circumnavigated the globe.

In the town of Delavan, W. T., not a drop of ardent spirits has ever been known to be sold or drunk.

Hezekiah Keyser has been committed to jail in Sullivan county, N. Y., for having three wives. Two lived within four miles of each other.

About ten acres of land on the west bank of the Mississippi, a few miles below the mouth of Red River, sunk a few nights since. So says the St. Francisville Chronicle.

James Hall's store, at Portageville, Allegany co., N. Y., was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 18th inst., with most of its contents. Also the grocery stores of Levi Truesdell and Capt. Power, and the tavern-house of H. O. Brown.

The expense of living in Cincinnati must be low at the present time, since the Chronicle of the 10th says the prices of produce are, on an average, about one half those reported in Philadelphia.

We understand that Washington Irving, our Minister to Spain, has taken passage in the packet ship Independence, to sail on the 7th of April, for Liverpool.

A merchant of Boston, the other day, received one hundred and ninety dollars, by mail, from some unknown source, as a payment of some unknown debt.

The Philadelphia Inquirer says, that in consequence of a want of adequate protection, several of the large iron works at Pittsburg, Pa., have stopped for the present, while a number of foundries are doing but a limited business.

A Shock for the West.—We have already recorded the decisive vote by which the British House of Commons has sustained Sir Robert Peel in repulsing any modification of the Corn Laws, which shall operate in our behalf as a practical amelioration of the present restrictive policy. The reduction acceded to may let in a few more bushels from England's immediate neighbors, Germany and Poland; but long before we can hear that the price has risen, and the duty fallen there, the needed supply will be obtained from those countries, the prices go up again, and any Grain which may have started from this Country will be met by high duties and low prices, to the certain ruin of the rash adventurer who ships it. This policy was resolved on after full debate, in which the Whig leaders did their utmost for Free Trade in grain, and were defeated by the decisive majority of 123 in 575 votes. Great Britain by this vote utterly refuses to take American Grain for her Manufactures. Shall we continue to buy them?—N. Y. Tribune.

Slave Stealing.—There is a controversy between the States of North Carolina and Mississippi respecting a case of negro stealing. Some citizens of Mississippi it seems stole a man and carried him into North Carolina. The Government of Mississippi have ordered the Government of N. Carolina to give up the man, but Governor Morehead says he will not. Thereupon the Mississippians pass resolutions denouncing the North Carolinians. One would think from the fuss that is made, that man stealing was unknown at the South. The indignation manifested against the Mississippi thief is much like that of the distiller and the wholesale dealer in rum against the keeper of the unlicensed grog shop.

2000 become 52,000.—Mr. Tappan remarked at our late meeting that he held in his hand the report of the President of the Board of Physicians of New York, wherein it was stated that out of fifty-two thousand pipes of wine consumed in this country, only two thousand were imported, the rest being made of New England rum and other deleterious ingredients.—Tem. Journal.

Shocking.—The editor of the London Patriot, a religious paper, relates the following fact: A widow had three young children at a day school. In consequence of the dearness of bread, she was compelled to withdraw first the two elder, and at length the youngest, in order to avail herself of their infant labor. She was remonstrated with—the youngest was only two and twenty months old. It was said, "his labor can be of no use." "He can earn a loaf per week; and without that additional loaf, we must go to the parish." To earn this, the poor little thing was constantly employed from morning to night; and the value of his week's labor just amounted to a loaf.

Hints to Gardeners.—Experienced agriculturists tell us that all plants, whether in the garden, field, or forest, if in rows, should be placed in the direction of North, and South, in order to admit the sun's rays every day to both sides of the row.

Ice brought from the Illinois river to Cincinnati, was sold on the 20th ult., at auction, at prices ranging from $4,25 to $6,25 a ton.

A few days ago, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Morgan, of New York, presented a petition, praying Congress to assume the debts of Mississippi, and eject that State from the Union! Mr. Thompson of Mississippi, was quite angry, and threatened to call any man a scoundrel who should intimate that his beloved State had acted dishonorably.—Lowell Courier.

NOTICE TO INSPECTORS OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

The time for the commencement of the Summer Term is near at hand.

It is recommended to the County Superintendent to assemble the teachers as often as may be, at convenient places, that they may communicate with him and each other on the best modes of promoting the success of their schools. By comparing their views respecting the manner of teaching, the government of schools, and the various topics of practical duty, they will eventually derive much benefit.

In accordance with the above recommendation, I will weet the teachers of the several Towns in the following order:

Nelson, April 18, at H. Anderson's Erieville.

De Ruyter, 19th, at Gage's.

Georgetown, 20th, at Moseley's.

Lebanon, 21st, at Campbell's

Hamilton, 22, at the Eagle Tavern.

Eaton, 23, at the Washingtonian House, Morrisville.

Madison, 25th, at Curtis's.

Brookfield, 26th, at S. Woodworth's, Clarkesville.

To economize time, labor, and expense, I propose that the Inspectors meet and examine the teachers in the early part of the day, and I will endeavor to meet them at 1 o'clock P. M.

The attendance of all the teachers is earnestly and respectfully solicited.

E. MANCHESTER, Dep. Sup't.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S. Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

 To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51:12

UNITED STATES' INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.
CAPITAL,
ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!
Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.
CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,
COMBINING
FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE
SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon, exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

Commissioners:

EDWARD ROGERS,
A. C. H. SMITH,
BARON S. DOTY,
CORNELIUS MASTEN,
PLATT ADAMS,
M. OGDEN,
E. G. MERRICK,
ELIAS GOODSPEED,
CALVIN K. AVERILL,
BENJAMIN BALCH.

Any communication relative to the business of this company, made in New York city, if addressed to BENJAMIN BALCH, will receive prompt attention. 50:1m

Agencies of this company will be appointed in such states as may wish to secure them; but only upon an interest being first taken in the stock.

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

For the Register.

MR. BAILEY—The following chaste and beautiful lines were sent to me by a friend, and although they appear without credit as to their origin, nevertheless the sentiment is worthy the head and heart of any one. X. Y. Z.

New Scenes.

New scenes are around me, and they seem to change
The color of my thoughts. Dark shadows pass
Like vapors of the morning, and my heart
Beats with the healthful pulse of early days.
I would that some few things which haunt my mind
Were covered with oblivion's sullen waves,
And washed away forever—so that life
Might lose its weariness; and be again
A renovated blessing and a charm.
Oh, it is beautiful to see the light
Of our young dreams break through dark mists of gloom,
And sweep them onward—till hope's glorious hues,
Like autumn tints upon the dying leaves,
Glow o'er the heart.

Summer smiles once again
As in the years gone by—its breezes play
Upon my lightened spirits, and the wings
Of the wild zephyrs catch each passing thought
And bear them to deserted groves and bowers,
Where the gay robin stops to carol forth
His joyous lay; while the green leaves keep time
With gentle motion; and young buds and flowers
Seem listening e'en in their unconscious life.
Cease, mem'ry, cease! No further now pursue
Past images of bliss. It is enough
That the bright pageant long has passed away,
And I am here, as in another world,
Mixing at times amid the stranger throng
To fly from thought, and stifle the regrets
Which wake in solitude.

There are some dreams,
Some vivid dreams of life, which fade so slow
And faintly from the mind, that years must on
Ere they can mingle in the shades of time,
And be forgotten. Oh, are they not dreams
Indeed! The visions only of a day!
Yet, would their spell were o'er me even now,
Amidst these scenes, I could be happy still;
I feel the power to be so in my heart.
But then there comes a thought, a mem'ry, borne
Sometimes upon a rustling leaf, and oft
Upon some fragile flower, which tells its tale,
And dies—while still th' unwelcome thought lives on—
Lives midst the stars at night, and the green grass
By day—or in the sound of the wild winds,
Which, in their wild mysterious wanderings, wake
Some silent chord, and send its echo back
From the deep, hollow past—or in the tones
Of the low murm'ring waters, which draw in
The notes of life's lost music, with their own,
Until the whole is sad. Away, away!
All here is new—and I, I too am changed;
Changed with the changing world—striving to gain
The coldness and the apathy which chills
The feelings at their source; for not to feel,
I almost think were bliss. To look on life,
E'en with the stoic's eye—to see the few
In whom we trust most, warped, turn'd aside,
And not regret it. Ay, to gaze on them,
As in their carelessness they pass us by,
And hate not friendship's name.

Such are the ones
For whom life holds out its unbroken charm—
For whom no inward pang, beneath cold pride,
Preys like a canker-worm upon the heart,
For whom no dark remembrance follows still
The flying steps, and casts o'er novelty,
Visions of strange resemblance wich destroy
Its gloss and charm: and bring the wish, long vain,
And yet the more intense, because 'tis vain.
Come back, come back!—But no—I call thee not.
'Twas but a momentary thought; for thou
Art nothing now to me. Thy heart is linked
To stern and fierce ambition. Go thy way.
The past shall be like the forgotten waves
Of the great ocean, which break on its breast,
And sparkle for a moment in the light,
Then mingle in the sea—leaving their place
To others which press onward to the spot,
Seeming with prouder swell to foam and dash
Over their ruins—yet, in turn to lie
Beneath the next. Such, such is human life.

CHRONOLOGY AND STATISTICS OF TOBACCO.

BY JOEL MUNSELL.

The whole world, within the space of about three centuries, have become chewers, smokers, and snuffers. The Chinese chews and smokes his opium, the East-Indian his betel, and the European and American their tobacco. Against these practices it is useless to declaim. It was in vain that the parliament of England discouraged the flagrant delit of smoking; in vain did James I. assure his subjects that the custom was "loathsome to the eye, hatefull to the noise, harmfull to the braine, dangerous to the lungs, and in the black stinking fume thereof, nearest resembling the horrible Stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless." The strong arm of the law opposed it; the priest and the physician, the moralist and the philantropist arrayed themselves against it; all to no purpose. Opposition only served to make proselytes, and the custom has spread far and wide under persecution, till over the whole surface of the globe its fumes arise constantly to the atmosphere, and it is at this moment, perhaps, the most general luxury in existence. In the city of New York alone, the consumption of cigars is computed at ten thousand dollars a day—a sum greater than that which its inhabitants pay for their daily bread; and in the whole country the annual consumption of tobacco is estimated at one hundred million pounds, being seven pounds to every man, woman, and child, at an annual cost to the consumers of twenty millions of dollars!

It may be curious to mark by what gradations the use of tobacco has reached this grand crisis. The subject attracted the attention of Prof. Beckmann of Gottingen, about the middle of the last century, who took great pains to ascertain the dates of its introduction into the different countries of Europe, and from whose work some of the following items are gathered. He conjectures that even before the discovery of the fourth quarter of the globe, a sort of tobacco was smoked in Asia; and this opinion was also entertained by the celebrated traveler, M. Pallas, who says that, "Among the Chinese, and among the Mogol tribes who had the most intercourse with them, the custom of smoking is so general, so frequent, and become so indispensable a luxury; the tobacco purse affixed to their belt, so necessary an article of dress; the form of the pipes, from which the Dutch seem to have taken the model of their's as original; and, lastly, the preparation of the yellow leaves, which are merely rubbed to pieces and then put into the pipe, so peculiar, that we cannot possibly derive all this by the way of Europe from America, especially as India, where the habit of smoking tobacco is not so general, intervenes between Persia and China." It may be too late now to investigate the subject, even if it should be considered worth the trouble. But there is one more important confirmation of Prof. Beckman's conjecture to be adduced from Ulloa's Voyage to America, who says:—"It is not probable that the Europeans learned the use of tobacco from America; for as it is very ancient in the eastern countries, it is natural to suppose that the knowledge of it came to Europe from those regions by means of the intercourse carried on with them by the commercial states on the Mediterranean Sea. Nowhere, not even in those parts of America where the tobacco grows wild, is the use of it, and that only for smoking, either general, or very frequent." We have nothing, however, authentic, earlier than the following:

In 1496, Romanus Pane, a Spanish monk, whom Columbus, on his second departure from America had left in that country, published the first account of tobacco, with which he became acquainted in St. Domingo. He gave it the name of cohoba, cohabba, gioia.

In 1519, tobacco is said to have been discovered by the Spaniards near Tobasco, though it is assigned to the next year.—("Cette plante, (tabac,) acre et caustique, trovee in 1520, pres de Tobasco dans le golfe du Mexique."—Precis sur l'Amerique, p. 116.)

In 1535, the negroes had already habituated themselves to the use of it, and cultivated it on the plantations of their masters. Europeans likewise already smoked it. We also find from a passage in Cartier's Voyage, that it was used in Canada. ("There groweth a certain kind of herbe, whereof in summer they make great provision for all the yeere, and only the men use of it; and first they cause it to be dried in the sunne, then weare it about their neckes, wrapped in a little beastes skinne made like a little bagge, with a hollow peece of stone or wood like a pipe; then when they please they make poudre of it, and then put in one of the ends of the said cornet or pipe, and laying a coal of fire upon it, at the other end sucke so long, that they fill their bodies full of smoke, till that it cometh out of their mouth and nostrils, even as out of the tonnell of a chimney."

In 1559, tobacco was introduced into Europe from St. Domingo, by a Spanish gentleman named Hernandez de Toledo, who brought a small quantity into Spain and Portugal. In the same year Jean Nicot, envoy from the court of France to Portugal, first transmitted thence to Paris, to Queen Catharine de Medicis, seeds of the tobacco plant; and from this circumstance it acquired the name of Nicotiana. When tobacco began to be used in France, it was called herbe du grand prieure, from the grand prieure of the house of Lorraine, who was then very fond of it. It was also called herbe de St. Croix, after Cardinal Prosper St. Croix, who, on his return from Portugal, where he had been nuncio from the Pope, introduced the custom of using tobacco. It was received at once in France and the Papal states with great enthusiasm, in the form of powder, or snuff; it was sometime after this period, that smoking became popular.

In 1565, Conrad Gesner became acquainted with tobacco. At that time several botanists cultivated it in their gardens. The same year Sir John Hawkins carried tobacco from Florida to England, where "all men wondered what it meant."

In 1570, they smoked in Holland out of conical tubes composed of palm leaves, plaited together.

In 1575, first appeared a figure of the plant in Andre Thevot's Cosmographie.

In 1585, the English first saw pipes made of clay among the natives of Virginia, which had just been discovered by Sir Richard Grenville. It appears likewise that the English soon after fabricated the first clay tobacco pipes in Europe.

In 1590, Schah Abbas of Persia, prohibited the use of tobacco in his empire; but the practice had become so deep-rooted among his subjects, that many of them fled to the mountains, and abandoned every thing else to enjoy the luxury of smoking.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century they began to cultivate tobacco in the East Indies.

In 1604, James I., of England, endeavored by means of heavy imposts, to abolish the use of tobacco, which he held to be a noxious weed.

In 1610, the smoking of tobacco was known at Constantinople. To render the custom ridiculous, a Turk, who had been found smoking, was conducted about the streets, with a pipe transfixed through his nose. For a long time after the Turks purchased tobacco from the English, and that the refuse. It was late[illegible] began to cultivate the plant the[illegible]

In 1615, tobacco began to be sown about Amersfort, in Holland, which afterwards became famous for its cultivation.

In 1616, the colonists began to cultivate tobacco in Virginia. It is not known whether the plant was indigenous, or whether it came from a more southern country. It is supposed the seeds were from Tobago. But it seems to have been in use among the Virginia Indians at the time they were visited by the English, and was called by them petun, or petum. Clavigero says, "tobacco is a name taken from the Haitine language." Humboldt also derives it from the same language, and says that the term was used to designate the pipe, or instrument made use of by the natives in smoking the herb, which the Spainards transferred to the herb itself, and after them, the other nations of the old world.

In 1619, James I. wrote his Counterblast to Tobacco, and ordered that no planter in Virginia should cultivate more than one hundred pounds a year. He also prohibited its sale in England or Ireland until the custom should be paid and the royal seal affixed. Twenty thousand pounds were exported this year from Virginia to England, the whole crop of the preceding year.

In 1620, ninety young women were sent over from England to America and sold to the planters for tobacco, at one hundred and twenty pounds each. The price at first was one hundred pounds, which gradually increased to one hundred and fifty pounds. King James issued a proclamation restraining the disorderly trade in this obnoxious article. In the same year some English companies introduced the smoking of tobacco into Zittau, in Germany, and Robert Konigsman, a merchant, brought the tobacco plant from England to Strasburg.

In 1622, the annual import of tobacco into England from America, for the last seven years, was 142,085 pounds.

In 1624, the Pope published a decree of excommunication against all who should take snuff in the church, because then already some Spanish ecclesiastics used it during the celebration of mass. King James restricted the culture of tobacco to Virginia and the Somner isles, and forbade its importation from any other quarter, considering England and Wales "as utterly unfyt in respect of the clymate, to cherish the same for any medicinall use, which is the only good to be approved in yt."

In 1631, the smoking of tobacco was introduced into Misnia, by some Swedish troops.

In 1634, a tribunal, called the chamber of tobacco, was formed at Moscow, which prohibited smoking under the pain of having the nose slit; and the Grand Duke defended the entrance of tobacco with the infliction of the knout for the first offense, and death for the second.

In 1639, the grand assembly of Virginia passed a law that all tobacco planted in that and the two succeeding years, should be destroyed, except such a proportion to each planter as should make in the whole 120,000 pounds, and that the creditors of the planters should receive 40 pounds for every 100 pounds due them.

In 1653, smoking began in the Canton of Apenzell, in Switzerland. At first the children ran after those who smoked in the streets. They were likewise cited before the council and punished, and the innkeepers were ordered to inform against such as should smoke in their houses.

In 1661, the police regulation of Berne, in Switzerland, was made, which was divided according to the ten commandments. In it, the prohibition to smoke tobacco, stands under the rubric, "thou shalt not commit adultery," and was continued in force until the middle of the last century.

In 1669, the crimes of adultery and fornication, were punished in Virginia by a fine of from 500 to 1000 pounds of tobacco.

In 1670, and the two following years, smoking of tobacco was punished in the Canton of Glaurus, by a fine of one crown Swiss money.

In 1676, the whole custom on tobacco from Virginia, collected in England, was $600,000. In the same year two Jews first attempted the cultivation of tobacco in the margravate of Bradenburg; but which, however, was not brought to bear till 1681.

In 1689, Jacob Francis Vicarius, an Austrian physician, invented the tubes for tobacco pipes, which have capsules containing bits of sponge; however, about the year 1670, already pipes were used having glass globules appended to them, to collect the oily moisture exuding from the tobacco.

In 1690, Pope Innocent XII. excommunicated all who should be guilty of taking snuff or tobacco in the church of St. Peter at Rome.

In 1697, great quantities of tobacco already were produced in the palatinate of Hesse.

In 1709, the yearly exports of tobacco from America for the last ten years, were 28,858,666 pounds; of which 11,260,659 pounds were annually consumed in Great Britain, and 17,598,007 pounds in the countries of Europe.

In 1719, the senate of Strasburg prohibited the culture of tobacco from an apprehension that it would diminish the growing of corn.

In 1724, Pope Benedict XIV. revoked the Bull of excommunication published by Innocent, because he had acquired the habit of taking snuff.

In 1732, tobacco was made a legal tender in Maryland, at one penny a pound.

In 1747, and the two years previous, there were annually exported to England from the American colonies, 40,[illegible] pounds of tobacco, 7,000,000 of which was consumed in England. The annual revenue was about $4,500,000.

In 1753, the King of Portugal farmed out the tobacco trade for about $2,500,000. The revenue of the King of Spain from tobacco, amounted to $6,330.000.

In 1749, the duties on tobacco in Denmark, brought in $40,000.

In 1770, the Empress of Austria received a revenue from tobacco of $800,000.

In 1773, the duties on tobacco in the two Sicilies, amounted to $446,000.

In 1775, the annual export of tobacco from the United States, for the last four years, was one million pounds; for the last thirty years it averaged 40,000,000 pounds, of which 7,000,000 were consumed in Great Britain, and 33,000,0000 in the other European countries.

In 1780, the King of France received from tobacco a revenue of about $7,250,000.

In 1782, the annual export of tobacco during the preceding seven years war of the Revolution, had been 12,378,504 pounds. Of the total seven years' exportation, 33,974,949 pounds were captured by the British.

In 1787, the quantity imported into Ireland was 1,877,579; in 1829, 4,124,742 pounds.

In 1789, the quantity exported from the United States, together with the two previous years, averaged about 900,000,000 pounds.

In 1820, the quantity of tobacco grown in France had doubled in three years, being 32,837,500 pounds.

In 1828, the revenue on tobacco in the state of Maryland was $27,275.

In 1830, the revenue on tobacco and snuff in Great Britain was nearly $13,000,000.

In 1834, the value of tobacco used in the U. S., was estimated at $16,000,000; of which $9,000,000 were supposed to have been for smoking Spanish cigars; $6,500,000 for smoking American tobacco and chewing; and $500,000 for snuff.

In 1838, the annual consumption of tobacco in the U. S. was estimated at one hundred million pounds, valued at twenty million dollars cost to the consumers, being seven pounds to each individual of the whole population.

In 1840, it was ascertained by a committee appointed to procure and report statistical information on the subject, that about one million five hundred thousand persons were engaged in the manufacture and cultivation of tobacco in the United States; one million of whom were in the states of Virginia, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri. Allowing the population of the whole country to be seventeen millions, it will be seen that nearly one-tenth are in some way engaged in the cultivation or manufacture of this article. The value of the export during that year was nearly $10,000,000.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

ROOF'S FOUNDER OINTMENT,

For the cure of foundered horses, split-hoofs, or hoof-bound horses; also, all wounds or bruises in the flesh, galled backs, cracked heals occasioned by overreach, or tread of another horse, Scratches, &c.

For which the subscribers have been appointed sole agents for this place.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

One of the best medicines for common colds Influenzas &c. &c. &c., to be found in the whole catalogue of patent medicines. Give it a try, it is first rate, call and read one of his circulars.

HAVE YOU A COUGH?

70 000 DIE OF CONSUMPTION every year in the United States, and millions suffer from troublesome coughs and colds, that can be cured by Dr. Hitchcock's Vegetable Cream Cough Drops, a safe medical prescription, containing no poisonous drugs, and used in an extensive practice for several years will most positively afford relief, and save you from that awful disease, pulmonary consumption, which sweeps into the grave hundreds of the young, the old, the lovely and the gay.

Have you a cough!—Be persuaded to purchase a bottle of the Cough Drops to-day! To-morrow may be too late. Price, 75 cents per bottle.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC.

FOR the cure of RING BONE, SPAVIN, WIND GALLS, &c. &c. ☞A certain cure in all cases.☜ Many certificates can be shown, and will be if wished, to place this inestimable specific as a perfect cure, beyond a doubt.

Historical Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion.

LECTURE III.—THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY G. M. LANGWORTHY.

[Concluded.]

4. Another thing which demands our notice is the absence of every appearance of bad design. I challenge any man to point out one fact or speech in either of the gospels, or any other writings of the New Testament, which has the least appearance of having a bad end in view. Every thing which was said or done by these men, or which is related to have been said or done by Christ, has no other end in view than the relieving of the distressed, the consoling of the afflicted, and in short the benefitting of the human family, and glorifying God. We are then reduced to this strange conclusion, that four books, written by impostors, contain a series of falsehoods, which in no part betray the least appearance of sinister purpose or ill design. Certainly no other books written by deceivers possess these characteristics. We have some instances of men of learning and piety manifesting great candor in the accounts which they have left of their own errors, prejudices and faults, but in all of them may be seen the semblance if not the reality of human frailty. Some infidels also have come forward before the world, with confessions and narratives of their lives and even of their secret crimes.—Of this class is Rosseau, who professes to exhibit to the world a full confession of his faults, during a period of many years; in which he has exposed to view sufficient moral turpitude, to make, if it were possible a demon blush.

But this infatuated man gloried in his shame, and declared that when he should be called before the tribunal of Heaven, he would appear with his book in his hand, and present it to his Judge as his confession and his apology. This very affectation discovers the most disgusting pride and arrogance. And while common sense and decency are outraged by a needless confession of deeds which ought never to be named, this man, so far from exhibiting any thing like true penitence, appears as the shameless apologist of vice. His confessions were obviously made in a confidence of the corruption of mankind, from whom he expected much applause for his candor, and but little censure for his vices. Between such impious confessions as these, and that simple, candid, humble and unassuming statements of the evangelists, there can be no comparison.

5. The last thing that I will mention concerning the candor of the witnesses is, that in all the detailed narratives which they have given of Jesus Christ, no allusion is made to his personal appearance—we are, for any thing the evangelists have written, just as ignorant of his statue, his aspect, his manner, and his complexion, as though we had never seen their account of him. This hardly corresponds with the style of the novelist who never fails to set out his characters in the most interesting, and to secure this object, embellished manner. The fact is, we must admit that the writers of the New Testament were intent only on giving a true account of the sayings and doings of their Master, without the least anxiety of adding anything which should in the least degree prejudice the mind in favor of his character, or operate upon the sympathies or passions of our nature in favor of him. The understanding is addressed in the most simple and undesigning manner possible, and the judgement called to decide upon questions of plain matter of fact. Had the evangelists been disposed to convert to their advantage the personal qualifications of Christ, they would in this respect have been more successful than any other writers, whether novelists or true historians, as may be seen from the following account of him, sent by "Publius Lentulus, President of Judea, to the Senate of Rome."

"There lives at this time in Judea a man of singular character, whose name is Jesus Christ. The barbarians esteem him as a prophet, but his followers adore him as the immediate offspring of the immortal God. He is endowed with such unparallelled virtues as to call back the dead from their graves, and to heal every kind of disease with a word or a touch. His person is tall and elegantly shaped, his aspect amiable and reverend; his hair flows in those beauteous shades which no united colors can match, falling in graceful curls below his ears, agreeably couching on his shoulders, and parting on the crown of his head; his dress of the sect of Nazarites; his forehead is smooth and large; his cheeks without either spot, save that of lovely red; his nose and mouth are formed with exquisite symmetry; his beard is thick and suitable to the hair of his head, reaching a little below his chin, and parting in the middle like a fork; his eyes are bright, clear and serene. He rebukes with mildness, and invites with most tender and persuasive language,—his whole address, whether in word or deed, being elegant, grave, and strictly characteristic of so exalted a being. No man has seen him laugh, but the whole world beholds him weep frequently; and so persuasive are his tears that the whole multitude cannot withhold their tears from joining in sympathy with him. He is very modest, temperate, and wise; in short, whatever this phenomenon may turn out in the end, he seems at present, to be a man of excellent beauty and divine perfections, every way surpassing the children of men!"

Religious Department.

POWER OF THE GOSPEL.

Review the history of our religion. See it on the day of Pentecost, "beginning at Jerusalem;" melting into penitence the bigoted and cruel multitude whose hands are yet reeking with its Author's blood; spreading despite the power and malice of its enemies, through Judea and the surrounding provinces; gathering its trophies in the idolatrous cities of Asia; crossing into Greece; confuting the philosophy of Athens; invading Italy; entering the palaces of the Cæsars; flying with the Roman eagles to the farthest corners of the earth; and reforming the habits and mouldering the polity of nations, the most diverse in their origin, circumstances, and laws. See its influence on the character of individuals; how it turns the proud, unsocial Jew into the disinterested lover of mankind: the persecuting Saul into the affectionate apostle; the heathen of Antioch into Christian confessors; the scoffers of Athens—the Epicureans, Stoics, and the careless votaries of folly and amusement—into penitent believers; the voluptuaries of Corinth into self-denying disciples; the idolators of Galatia, and Ephesus, and Phillippi, and Thessalonica, into saints and martyrs. See it pouring into the bosom of the Roman, the new sentiments of humility in respect to himself, and of brotherhood towards others; suppressing the shows of the gladiator, and the crimes of poisoning, infanticide, and self-destruction; abolishing polygamy, slavery, and the parental power of life and death; mitigating the penal law; confining, within just limits, that of divorce; and bringing back to connubial life the blessedness of Eden, by raising woman to the companionship, the duties, and the confidence for which she was designed. See it, in after ages, humanizing the ferocious Britain; softening the Vandal, and teaching mercy to the Goth. See it scattering throughout Europe the seeds of truth, and justice, and humanity, and social order, from which have sprung those various institutions which render Christendom so superior in government, in knowledge, in the arts and charities of life, and in all the elements of individual, domestic, and national happiness, to the most favored portions of the Mahommedan and Pagan world. See it from age to age, repeating its miracles of mercy, in the transformation and improvement of human character; changing the vulture to a dove, the tiger to a lamb; teaching the revengeful to forgive, and the miser to be liberal; purifying the hearts of the unclean, the hands of the fraudulent, and the lips of the profane; making the proud man humble, and chastening the desires of the ambitious; filling the bosoms of the poor, the friendless, and the afflicted, with resignation, cheerfulness, and hope; converting, oftentimes, the abandoned drunkard and the profligate debauchee—the very plague-spots of the earth—into ornaments of society and benefactors of mankind.—Rev. B. F. Butler.

From the Northern Advocate.

RELIGION.

What is religion? Go ask the infidel—hear his reply: "Religion is a dream, a phantom—nothing. His material eye can only scan the present; chaos shrouds the past, oblivion the future. Mingled in wild confusion are deeds of fame, and wreaths of glory, with actions vile, and damning seals of infamy. It matters not to him that Jesus died; the agonizing groan falls calmly on his ear; the soldier's spear pierces not his side, the crown of thorns tears not his head. He speaks of Paul and Stephen, of Luther and Melancthon, of Wesley and Calvin as indifferently as he would of the vilest menial that ever crossed the threshold of time. He indeed admires their valor but pities their discretion. He holds them up as patterns of heroism, but victims of delusion. Their tears, their cries, their sufferings were all but the fruits of a misguided, bigoted zeal. And what is death? you ask. 'Tis dissolution, darkness, anni——, he dares not say the word. Here his mind wanders. Not having the touchstone of eternal truth to appeal to, he is confused. He starts for causes; then by a sort of reasoning step by step, he arrives at effects, till the grave, that bourne from which no traveler returns, cuts short his inquiries. Hear him muse:

"Aye, but to die, and go, we know not where,
To moulder in obstruction and to rot;
This sensible, warm motion to become
A kneaded clod, and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery realms, or to reside
In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice,
To be imprisoned in the viewless wind
And blown with restless violence about
This pendant world."

Is there, then, no rest for the weary soul? Must the care-worn soldier of the cross, the champion of Israel, the elect of God, he who has borne the heat and burthen of the day to do his Master's will—must he, I say, enter the dark valley and the shadow of death with no hand to lead him? Must that hope which now animates, and cheers and nourishes the soul, that hope which is wont to pierce within the vail, to commune with God and the pure spirits that minister before his throne, that hope, which, though foes calumniate, and friends desert, remains "as an anchor both sure and steadfast"—must that thrice blessed hope be congealed forever by the icy touch of death? Reason says no, the Bible says no, and the Holy Spirit, the witness within, says no.

Ah! see that dying man. His cheeks are pale, his eyes are sunken, his lips are quivering, his limbs are stiffening. Hear him whisper,

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are."

Listen to the expiring words of Thomas Scott: "This is heaven begun below; I have done with darkness forever; Satan is vanquished—nothing remains but salvation and eternal glory." And who is it we hear exclaiming

"Sweet to rejoice in lively hope
That, when my change shall come,
Angels shall hover round my bed
And waft my spirit home!"

'Tis Thomas Charlton Henry; and as he views the mists of death gathering around him, he cries, "Eternity! there is my exalted, glorious home." How many believers have been in their last moments, able to apply to themselves the triumphant expression of the apostle Paul, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." If this is delusion, O glorious delusion! Call it what you will, if religion gives peace to the soul, and an assurance of eternal life, it is enough. "Let me live the life of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

J. K. C.

New York Mills, March, 1842.

PRAYING HIGHLANDER.—A Scotch Highlander, who served in the first disastrous war with the American colonies, was one evening brought before his commanding officer charged with the capital offense of being in communication with the enemy. The charge could not well be preferred at a more dangerous time. Only a few weeks had passed since the execution of Major Andre, and the indignation of the British, exasperated alone to madness by the event, had not yet cooled down. There was, however, no direct proof against the Highlander. He had been seen in the gray of the twilight stealing from out a clump of underwood that bordered on one of the huge forests, which, at that period, covered by much the greater part of the United Provinces, and which, in the immediate neighborhood of the British, swarmed with the troops of Washington. All the rest was mere inference and conjecture. The poor man's defense was summed up in a few words; he had stolen away from his fellows, he said, to spend an hour in private prayer. "Have you been in the habit of spending hours in private prayer?"—sternly asked the officer, himself a Scotchman and a Presbyterian. The Highlander replied in the affirmative. "Then," said the other, drawing out his watch, "never in all your life had you more need of prayer than now; kneel down, sir, and pray aloud that we may all hear you." The Highlander, in expectation of instant death, knelt down. His prayer was that of one long acquainted with the appropriate language in which the Christian addresses his God; it breathed of imminent peril, and earnestly implored the divine interposition in the threatened danger—the help of Him, who in times of extremity, is strong to deliver. It exhibited, in short, a man, who, thoroughly conversant with the scheme of redemption, and fully impressed with the necessity of a personal interest in the advantages which it secures, had made the business of salvation the work of many a solitary hour, and had, in consequence, acquired much fluency in expressing all his various wants as they occurred, and his thoughts and wishes as they arose. "You may go, sir," said the officer, as he concluded; "you have, I dare say, not been in correspondence with the enemy to-night. His statement," continued he, addressing himself to the other officers, "is, I doubt not, perfectly correct. No one could have prayed so without [illegible] apprenticeship; the fellows who have [illegible] attended drill, always get on ill at review."

He who neglects to cultivate his land will sustain a great loss. But he who neglects to cultivate and improve the mind will realize a far greater. Such an one will have poverty enough.

A WORLD OF DISAPPOINTMENT.—In the world, as in Ramah, 'a voice is heard lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning.' Earthly possessions and satisfactions of every sort are, by their nature, transient. They must leave us, we must leave them. To him who views them, in their most settled state, with the eye of wisdom, they appear, as the air in the calmest day does to the philosopher through his telescope, ever undulating and fluctuating. If we place our happiness in them, we build upon the grave. It rolls from under us, and we sink into the depths of grief and despondency. Children, relations, friends, honors, houses, lands, revenues, and endowments, the goods of nature and of fortune, nay, even of grace itself, are only lent. It is our misfortune to fancy they are given.—We start, therefore, and are angry, when the loan is called in. We think ourselves masters, when we are but stewards; and forget that to each of us will it one day be said, 'Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou must be no longer steward.' Youth dreams of joy unremitted, and pleasures uninterrupted; and sees not, in the charming perspective, the cross accidents that lie in wait to prevent their being so. But should no such accidents for a while intervene, to disturb the pleasing vision, age will certainly awake, and find it at an end. The scythe of time will be as effectual, though not so expeditious, as the sword of the persecutor; and without a Herod, Rachel, if she live long, will be heard lamenting; she will experience sorrows, in which the world can administer no adequate comfort. She must therefore look beyond it.—Horne.

A WARM HEART.

"I have a cold heart. I cannot pray!" But I ask you, is not a warm heart a good gift? If it is so, then I add, it stands written: "If ye who are evil yet know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your Father bestow favor upon them who ask it." It is a mistake, a dangerous error to suppose that man should pray only when his heart prompts. What shall one do, when his heart dies away, and incites him no more? Knowest thou not, that the soul is stimulated by prayer itself. Hast thou never yet experienced that happy state, when the soul, grieving over its inward barrenness and coldness, casts itself down and begins with frigid feeling to pray, and this very prayer transforms the heart of stone into one of flesh, and thine affections begin to swell within thee and to pour themselves out more and more freely, and they [illegible] flow forth in richer and richer abundance, and thou canst find no end to them, and thou art overpowered and criest aloud: "Yea, verily, Oh God, thou canst do superabundantly above all that we ask and think?" But you say: "Alas! my supplication falls back again so cold and faint upon me. It seems as if I mocked God with my prayer, full of words but without a soul." Brother, I ask you only one question: do you hunger for the bread of life? If you do, then certainly you do not mock your God with your supplication. Shall it be that you entreat longingly for bread and are refused? Nay, nay, he in whose countenance we behold all that is paternal, hath inquired:—What man is there among you, who, if his son ask for bread, will give him a stone?" Cry out in full thirst, "Bread, Father! I wish! Thou who givest earthly bread to the young ravens, thy child longeth for the bread of the soul." And do you think that to you alone among all mortals, there would come a refusal?—Tholuck.

ROOT AND BRANCHES.—Our religion may be compared to a great tree, of which the doctrines are the roots and uprightness is the trunk, and godly deeds and all the ministries of love are the outspreading branches, and piety is the heavenward pointing head. As a tree grows up from its roots, and they nourish and support it: so do the duties of religion grow out of its doctrines, and rest on its doctrines, and draw their life from them. If the trunk of a tree be separated from the roots, it falls, nor will a man's morality be able to stand, unless it be rooted and anchored deep in the great truths of religion. Any hour of trial, a gust of passion, a sharp blast of temptation from an exposed quarter, would lay such unsupported virtue low. It would fall, like the house built on the sand; and great and sad would its fall be. But as a tree is nothing without its roots, so the roots on the other hand are nothing without the tree. It is for the sake of supporting the branching, wide-spreading tree, that there are any roots at all. No one ever saw a root growing by itself, and for itself. A root without a tree would be the same sort of thing among God's works, as a fountain without a house among man's works. Nor is this less true of the spiritual roots of faith. God, who does nothing in vain, has not revealed any doctrine to us for the mere sake of feeding our curiosity, or of making us stare and wonder. Doctrines from which nothing spring would be as much out of place in the book of God's word, as roots from which nothing grows would be in the book of nature. Such roots are not living, but dead. Whenever therefore you come to any doctrine in the Bible, bear in mind that the Scriptures were not written to make us wise merely, in that which the world deems wisdom—but wise unto salvation.—Hare.

HOW TO HAVE GOOD PREACHING.—If we could have such preaching as that, (said a professor of religion a few days since, while returning from a funeral in C., and commenting upon some remarks made by the minister upon the judgment day,) we might live. I believe that many churches might have better preaching than they do, if there was more religion in exercise among the lay members. How often do we hear church members complaining that their preacher is dead, or not engaged, or does not preach so well as he used to. Would it not be well for these church members to look to themselves, and see if the fault is not partly or altogether on their own account. Let them, instead of complaining about their preacher, pray for him, and labor with him, and contribute to his support; and they would have much more peace and enjoyment while sitting under his preaching, than they do. How embarrassing it is to a minister to see meetings for prayer and conference neglected, and that too by the officers of the church; and on the holy Sabbath, for them to let trifling obstacles prevent their attending at the house of worship. Should the minister work in his sphere, and every lay member in his, we should have good ministers, good preaching, good brethren, good sisters, good exhortations, good prayers, and O, what a light then would emanate from the church! How soon divisions would cease, turmoils come to an end. The spirit of the holy religion of Jesus Christ would possess every soul in the church, sinners would fear and tremble under the mighty power of God, and, fleeing to Christ, would find a hiding place from the storm of God's wrath that awaits the ungodly, and a far brighter day would dawn upon us.

BAPTIST.

Limington, March 26, 1842.

THE TEMPTATION IN THE WILDERNESS—A lesson which we learn from this part of the Messiah's history is, that, in all cases, we must be ready to sacrifice our personal desires, feelings and interests, when called upon to do so by our duty to God, and a conscientious performance of the work which he has given us to do. Men are too apt to imagine, that, if they discharge the requirements of justice, and to a certain extent the office of benevolence, towards their fellow-men, they are at liberty to gratify, with little restraint, the principles of self-love, to promote in various ways their own ease, interest, and gratification. But the example of the Messiah places before them a higher standard,—the principle of pure devotedness to God, before which every selfish principle will fall, whenever the two sources of action come to be in any degree opposed to each other. The exalted tone of character, and feeling, thus arising, will lead a man earnestly to inquire, how he can promote the glory of God, and the highest interests of man:—what are the talents which have been committed to him, and for the improvement of which he must give an account of his stewardship;—what are the various means of usefulness, by which he can follow the footsteps of his Divine Master, and manifest towards him the spirit of devotedness and love;—what works can he perform, what sacrifices can he make, in the service of One who has redeemed him to God by his blood."—The Messiah as an Example.

THE BOOT BLACK AND THE COLLEGE PRESIDENT.

Two Scenes from Real Life. Some score of years since, the President of a well known College in Kentucky, was one morning, while sitting in his study, astonished by the entrance of a singular visitor.

The visitor was a boy of some seventeen years rough and uncouth in his appearance; dressed in coarse homespun, with thick clumsy shoes on his feet, an old tattered felt hat on his head, surmounting a mass of uncombed hair, which relieved swarthy and sun-burnt features, marked by eyes quick and sparkling, but vacant and inexpressive from want of education. The whole appearance of the youth was that of an untaught, uncultivated plough-boy.

The President, an affable and venerable man, inquired into the business of the person who stood before him.

'If you please, sir,' said the plough-boy, with all the hesitancy of an uneducated rustic, 'If you please, sir, I'd like to get some larnin'.'

'I heard you had a college in these parts, and I thought if I would work a spell for you, you would help me now and then in getting an education.'

'Well, my young friend,' replied the President, 'I scarcely can see any way in which you might be useful to us. Your request is somewhat singular ——'

'Why, I can bring water; cut wood, or black your boots,' interrupted the boy, his eyes brightening in his earnestness. 'I want to get an education—I want to make something of myself. I don't keer how hard I work, only so as to get an education. I want ——'

He paused at a loss for words to express his ideas. But there was a language in the expressive lip, and glancing eye; there was a language in his manner, in the tone in which the words were spoken, that appealed at once to the Professor's feelings.

He determined to try the sincerity of the youth.

'I am afraid, my young friend, that I can do nothing for you. I would like to assist you, but I see no way in which you can be useful to us at present.

The President resumed his book. In a moment he glanced at the ploughboy, who, silent and mute, stood holding the handle of the door. He fingered his rough hat confusedly in one hand—his eyes were downcast, and his upper lip quivered and trembled as though he were endeavoring to repress strong and sudden feelings of intense disappointment. The effort was but half successful. A tear, emerging from the downcast eye-lid, rolled over the sun-burnt cheek, and with a quick, nervous action, the plough-boy raised his toil-hardened hand and brushed away the sign of regret.

He made a well meant, but awkward mark of obeisance, and opened the door, had one foot across the theshold, when the President called him back.

The plough-boy was in a few moments hired as a man-of-all word, and boot black to the —— College.

* * * * *

The next scene which we give the reader, was in a new and magnificent church, rich with the beauties of architecture, and thronged by an immense crowd, who listened in death-like stillness to the burning eloquence of the minister of Heaven who delivered the mission of his Master from the altar.

The speaker was a man in the full glow of middle age, of striking and impressive appearance,—piercing intellectual eye, and high forehead.

Every eye is fixed on him—every lip is hushed, and every ear, with nervous intensity, drinks in the eloquent teachings of the orator.

Who in all that throng would recognize in the famed—the learned—the eloquent President of —— College, Pennsylvania, the humble boot black of —— College in Kentucky?

NOTHING LIKE THE BIBLE.

An affecting and remarkable Tale.

The circumstance itself occurred in the town of Warrington, and was related at a Bible meeting there, by a gentleman of respectability and veracity, connected with the society.

The circumstance was introduced in the following words:—About three weeks ago two little boys, decently clad, the elder appearing about thirteen and the younger eleven, called at the lodging house for vagrants, in this town, for a night's lodging. The keeper of the house, very properly, took them to the vagrant's office to be examined, and if proper objects, to be relieved. The account they gave of themselves was extremely affecting, and no doubt was entertained of its truth. It appears that but few weeks had elapsed since these poor little wanderers had resided with their parents in London. The typhus fever however carried off in one day both their father and mother, leaving the orphans in a wide world without home or friends. Immediately after the last mournful tribute had been paid to their parent's memory, having an uncle in Liverpool, poor and destitute as they were, they resolved to go and throw themselves upon his protection. Tired and faint, they arrived in this town on their way. Two bundles contained their little all. In the younger boy's pocket was found, neatly covered and carefully preserved, a Bible. The keeper of the lodging-house addressing the little boy said "You have neither money nor meat, will you sell me this Bible?" I will give you five shillings for it." "No," exclaimed he, the tears rolling down his youthful cheeks, "I'll starve first." He then said "there are plenty of books to be bought besides this; why do you love this Bible so much?" He replied, "No book has stood my friend so much as my Bible." "Why, what has your Bible done for you?" said he. He answered, "When I was a little boy about seven years of age, I became a Sunday scholar in London. Through the kind attention of my teacher I soon learned to read my Bible—this Bible young as I was, showed me that I was a sinner, and a great one too; it also pointed me to a Savior; and I thank God that I have found mercy at the hands of Christ, and I am not ashamed to confess him before the world."

To try him still farther, six shillings were then offered him for the Bible. "No," said he, "for it has been my support all the way from London: hungry and weary, often have I sat down by the way side to read my Bible, and have found refreshment from it." Thus did he experience the consolation of the Psalmist when he said, 'Thy comforts had refreshed my soul.' He was then asked, "What will you do when you get to Liverpool, should your uncle refuse to take you in. The reply may excite a blush in many Christians. "My Bible tells me," said he, "when my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." The man could go no farther, for tears choked his utterance, and they both wept together. They had in their pockets tickets, as rewards for their good conduct, from the school to which they belonged, and thankfulness and humility were visible in all their deportment.

At night these two orphans bending their knees by the side of their bed, committed themselves to the care of their Heavenly Father—to him whose ears are open to the prayers of the poor and destitute, and to him who has said, 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.' The next morning these refreshed little wanderers arose early, and dressed themselves for their journey, and set out for the town of Liverpool; and may he who hears the ravens when they cry, hear and answer their petitions, guide them through time, and bless them in eternity.

CHRIST.—We cannot trust too much to the merits of Christ as our only hope.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, April 13, 1842.

The absence of one of our hands has delayed our paper beyond its time this week.

The 5th of April.

The celebration of the 5th of April in this village was one of interest; and, considering the very unfavorable state of the weather, and the roads, was well attended. The exercises at the church were all in good taste, and the address of Mr. Carpenter, a sketch of which we publish, was listened to with feelings of the deepest interest. JOHN M. CARPENTER, once an unfortunate creature in the ditch, can now enchain the attention of an interested audience with his eloquence.

Mr. Carpenter remarked, "It is customary to keep in memory any great event by celebrating the day on which it occurred, as it annually returns to us. It is customary when such days return, for a community to call upon some one of their fellow-citizens publicly to address them, and bring before their minds the particular object gained on the day they thus celebrate. And the statesman, the patriot, together with men of the most splendid talents, and exalted genius, have thought themselves highly honored when thus called upon; and they have studied the art of persuasion and the powers of oratory and eloquence for the purpose of making a more deep and lasting impression on the minds and feelings of their hearers.

"Knowing this fact, with what fears and diffidence must I rise to address such an audience as I now see before me, and why am I called upon, having neither education, talents, or a mind in any way improved by associating with those calculated to improve it? Can it be possible that this vast assembly, composed as it is of all that is great and good, virtuous and fair, have come together of their own free will to listen to the voice of one who but a few short months ago was nestling in the very bosom of debauchery—one whose whole life has been spent in vice and degredation, and the numerous follies which are sure attendants in the train of dissipation.

"My friends, I stand before you a reformed drunkard, a member of the Washingtonian Total Abstinence Society, whose 2nd anniversary we this day celebrate; and the fact that you have assembled this day, and have called upon such an one as myself to address you, goes to prove that you are not only willing to admit that the drunkard may be reformed, but that you are anxious to do all you possibly can to bring about his reformation. Your being assembled, proves that this day is one worthy of being remembered, and of being handed down to posterity, by them to be celebrated with joy and rejoicing until time shall cease to be. Yes—

While from ocean's bed the sand
Is heaved—or flower bedeck the land—
Or circling through the vaults of heaven,
The planets are like lightning driven.

Let this day be ushered in with joy—let infant lips be taught to lisp the 5th of April—let the youth join in the triumphal procession—let maid and matron mingle in the throng—let the philanthropist shout aloud for joy—let the christian raise his voice in hallelujahs to our God—let old and young, rich and poor, bond and free, join to raise one grand universal chorus, until the concave skies sends back the sound, and the firm earth trembles with emotion. And do you ask what it is that calls for this united song of joy, I answer, a victory—yes—A VICTORY—one not gained upon a field of blood where it is difficult to determine which suffers most, the conquered or the conqueror—no armed hosts have been marshalled upon the battle-field to lay down their lives in defense of rights, or country—the dread panoply of war has not been seen stalking through the land—and yet there has been a victory gained greater than any before achieved by mortal man in any clime or any age. It is nothing less than man's victory over himself—the victory of reason over appetite—yes, the slave to appetite has burst asunder the fetters he had riveted with so much strength upon himself, and once more stands erect among his fellow men in all the majesty his god-like nature permits him to assume. And is this the case? Has this been accomplished? Yes. Would you see the trophies, look to the 50,000 wretched, wounded, dying, immortal beings, rescued from the jaws of the devouring monster—torn from the very grasp of the grand assassin of the human race, intemperance—look to the 200,000 children made glad in the return of a father who was lost, to support and cherish them, and guide their feet in paths of virtue and usefulness—look to the 50,000 wives and mothers who have thrown off their garb of wo, and appear clothed in smiles of hope and peace—look to the 200,000 moderate drinkers stopped midway in their career to infamy and death, and turned back to become useful members of society, and a comfort to all connected with them—these are our trophies, and it is over them that we are called to rejoice. O! it is a glorious victory, and one ever to be remembered. In achieving it, the very order of things have been reversed. In not a single instance have we taken life, but we have saved the life of many ready to expire—we have made no wounds, but, on the contrary, healed the wounds of thousands who were weltering in their blood. Instead of making prisoners of our fellowmen, we have set them free, as half a million thus emancipated can this day rise up and testify. I say, again, it is a glorious victory, and one for which we should rejoice; and think not, my friends, that rejoicing will stop here? I tell you nay, it will go on to other worlds, and angels in the realms of bliss will strike their golden harps to sweeter and more melodious tones than heretofore—the ransomed myriads around the eternal throne will raise their song of praise more long and loud, and higher waive the crowns of their rejoicing—nor will it stop here; the imprisoned spirits in a world of woe, will hail the annual return of this day, and rejoice that the principal resource for peopling their dark and gloomy caverns, is now cut off. It is an erroneous idea that "misery loves company." Read the story of Divese and Lazarus as related by the great architect of that infernal prison-house himself, and see if sympathy does not exist even in those mansions of despair."

After the exercises at the church, a large number repaired to the Temperance House of Martin Spear. Our host had furnished a profusion of good things for the entertainment of his guests. After partaking of the supper, we spent a short time in social intercourse, in which the following, among other sentiments, were offered, interspersed with Temperance songs and animated remarks. The whole exercises from beginning were full of interest, and will doubtless very much advance the interests of the cause.

REGULAR TOASTS.

Our glorious Cause.—Onward and upward be its course, inhaling the moral atmosphere in its purity, far from the corruptions of Political strife, and free from the intolerance of Fanaticism.

The Total Abstinence Pledge.—The Hope of the Statesman, the pride of the Philanthropist, and the joy of the Christian.

The Temperance Tree—Has taken deep root in American soil—already has it budded and blossomed—may its fruits be perennial, and its leaves prove a panacea for all the ills that Intemperance has produced.

The Temperance Reformation.—An honor to the 19th century, and indicative of the supremacy of the intellectual faculties over the animal propensities.

The "Departed Spirits."—May they all reach that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns.

The Distilleries.—A standing monument of our country's disgrace.

King Alcohol.—Mene Tekel, is written on the wall of thy palace! God hath numbered thy kingdom and finished it! Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting!

The Ladies.—Warm in their attachment to Cold water—Cold water men are in duty bound to reciprocate the feeling.

Music.—When Reason fails, Music conquers; those who cannot be talked into Temperance should be sung into it.

Our Heaven-directed Enterprise.—May its progress never cease, till our Nation is redeemed from Intemperance.

VOLUNTEER TOASTS.

By Maj. Ira Gage Barnes. The Principle of Total Abstinence.—A platform broad enough, resting upon a foundation strong enough to support the whole human family. May they all get on to it and see.

By Z. T. Bentley, Esq. The Clergy and Reformed Inebriates.—In surrounding this festive board together, they have proved the Scripture, "The lion and the lamb shall lie down together, and the little child shall lead them."

By Rev. J. B. Pixley. The Proprietors of the De Ruyter Temperance Taverns.—We welcome them to our ranks as tee-totalers, and hail them as abettors in a glorious reform.

By Rev. James Bailey. Our Host; Martin Spear.—In opening his house as a Temperance house has made himself a deadly Spear, swifter than the Martin flies, for the destruction of King Alcohol.

By Eli A. Gage. Our Daughters.—None but Tee-Totalers shall have them.

By J. S. Bentley. The Originators of the Baltimore Reform.—Future generations shall rise up and call them blessed.

By A. N. Annas. The Temperance Reform.—Light, and Life, and Peace, and Joy follow in its wake.

By A. V. Bentley, Esq. The Fifty Thousand Reformed Inebriates of our Land—The achievements of the Temperance Cause. The victories of Waterloo, of Marengo, and the Nile, can not boast of prouder trophies than these.

Mr. T. S. FAIRCHILD, of Rochester, being present, was called on for a toast. He asked to be excused, but made the following remarks which were received with applause:—

"The cause of Temperance has lately received an impetus which has given it strength to move on with majestic strides over our land,—overcoming every obstacle,—surmounting every barrier,—riding over our cloud-capped hills, and piercing the deep vallies between,—spreading over our whole land, a bright, cheering, and awakening influence, like the rays of the morning sun over a reposing world—before it, was gloom and darkness; behind it, and in its wake, reigned the sunshine of gladness—where once was blackness and despair, now is brightness and hope,—where once oaths and vile imprecations were heard, now the voice of prayer and praise reigneth—the pale and sunken cheek have been exchanged for the plump and ruddy glow of health—eyes once dimmed with weeping, are now filled with joy and gladness, and the glad song of triumph, praise, and victory, is ringing in our ears all over our land. When we contemplate all this, we are led to inquire, "what has caused this great change"? and, who are they who have accomplished this important work?

"Not long ago, intemperance was going on to an alarming extent, filling the land with tears and wailing, and breaking the hearts of wives and children, carrying misery, disease, and death, all over our Republic! Who are they who put an effectual check to this? Who composed this "Spartan band" who stood so boldly at the "Pass of Thermopyle" and breasted the storm of battle, and fought against the countless hosts of the devil, and drove them back, and routed them "horse, foot, and dragoons." Was it the Aristocracy? Was it the Church, and her ministers? No! Nor dared they at once to do it. Nay, not a small proportion of both were to a greater or less extent involved in the guilt and tresspass to be opposed. Unless individuals, ministers, christians, and citizens, under some other than general church organizations, had undertaken the long-neglected work, the tide of intemperance would have gone unchecked to this hour, for, now, many nominally christian churches are not united in their opposition to the destroying foe! Who, then, we repeat it, are the men who accomplished this great work, greater than all the achievements of an Alexander, a Wellington, or a Napoleon? The very victims of the tyrant Alcohol themselves! As I said before, Intemperance was going on to such an alarming extent, breaking through all barriers, and causing such wretchedness, crime, and misery all over our land, that the very wretches themselves at last become ashamed and disgusted with their life of infamy, and THEY stepped forth in that place, which should have been filled by the church and her ministers, took this cause into their own hands, and NOBLY have they acquitted themselves.

"But what course did they pursue? Did they denounce the victim as the greatest and basest offender against God and man—by neglecting the man in his distress, and scarcely recognizing him as human except upon a day of an election—by torturing him with soul-scorching epithets in relation to the cause of his necessities when asking relief from starvation—by neglecting his family, and teaching other children not to associate with the unfortunate progeny of the drunkard? No! they did not do this—they did not take this course, for they knew by sad experience that such was the course that had been taken, and they knew that it would only result in an inflamation of the passions—they knew that the trials of the drunkard are sufficient, in all conscience, for him to bear, without adding that more dreadful pain, the frown of community.

"What, then, were their implements of warfare? They used the weapons of love and kindness—they went in person to the drunkard, they spake to him in kindness—they painted in dark and gloomy colors his own true condition—they told him of the sorrow and distress of his still-loving wife, and her patient endurance of his brutal and tyrannical behavior—they told him of his children, ragged, and deprived of the means of education, and their daily bread, and who shunned him, their own father, and trembled at his presence. They turned the page, and portrayed in bright and sunny characters the success that would attend his reform—they told him of the smiling countenance of his wife, of his children, no longer ragged, and shunned by others, but with healthy and smiling countenances would come every evening to meet him, when he returned from his daily toil to his own habitation, and they could not nor did not fail to touch the heart of the most degraded inebriate.

"Let us now for a moment look at the success which has attended this new mode of reform:—

"By its healthful influence, a new era is being ushered in—a brighter day is dawning upon the benighted prospects of temperance, and ushering in, in more effulgent radiance, the glad sunlight of teetotalism. Watch-fires are kindled, and are kindling, and thousands are flocking around them, armed and equipped with the weapons of love and truth, ready and willing to go forth to battle against the palsied and frightened hosts of the Philistines. The glad songs of the redeemed are sounding from hill to dale, from mountain to valley, and from crag to glen, and their exhilerating chorus seems, as it were, to scale the very battlements of heaven, and meet with a responsive echo from the harps of the countless hosts of angels stationed on its ramparts. The black flag of Intemperance is being every day deserted, and is

'Tottering, tottering, down it must go,
And in its place we'll rear the flag
Of Temperance true, and virtue too.'"

By Rev. J. R. Johnson. Our young Washingtonian, MR. FAIRCHILD.—May Heaven grant us many more such fair-children.

By Cyrus R. Jones. Cold Water. The element of Temperance—that which will strengthen the sinews, sustain the fortunes, and places no one in the gutter.

By John M. Carpenter. The Females who raise their voices to promote this glorious Reformation.—Is not by Intemperance

Woman's holiest feelings crushed!
And when woman's heart is bleeding,
Shall woman's voice be hushed!

By Eli A. Gage. The Six Baltimore Reformers.—May their names be enrolled on the escutcheon of fame, and generations yet unborn sing pæans of gratitude to their memory.

By Doct. Ira Spencer. The Band of Reformed Inebriates.—May they prove a beacon light to those yet in the murky atmosphere of Intemperance, to light them on up to the heights of Total Abstinence.

By James D. Tripp. The Total Abstinence Pledge.—None can ever become satisfied with the husks of Intemperance; may such as have strayed become returning prodigals, give to it their signatures, adhere to its principles for safety, and it will prove to them a substantial good.

The following volunteer Toasts from the LADIES were received with applause:—

By Miss C. M. Smith. The "glorious" Fifth of April—the Nation's second birthday—destined to immortality when King Alcohol shall have been dead, dead, yea, THRICE DEAD, and plucked up by the roots.

By Mrs. James D. Tripp. The Children of the Reformed Drunkards.—May they enjoy as much happiness now, as they have formerly had misery.

By Mrs. J. R. Rider. Health, wealth, and happiness to all the members of the Total Abstinence Society.

After Mr. Carpenter was requested, by a unanimous vote, to furnish a copy of his address for the press, he frankly stated that he apprehended that he should not succeed well in such an effort, for he was totally unacquainted with the rudiments of English Grammar. This modest apology occasioned the following sentiment:—

By Rev. J. R. Johnson. CARPENTER'S GRAMMAR.—We admire it; for it teaches how to speak and write the English language with sobriety.

We have admitted the following article from the fact that we believe it as necessary to keep the Temperance movement as free from such influences as the article describes, as from religious dictation. There was, without doubt, cause for the complaint made. We can not, however, think that all the actors were abettors in the affair. Such, of course, will not think themselves pointed out. It is well, however, for "those of the Ball," to know that a large portion of this community, and of the party dismissed, have no fellowship with such works of darkness.

Our Temperance Supper.

MR. EDITOR,—Allow me through the medium of the Register to make a few remarks upon the unceremonious ejectment of the company, from the Temperance entertainment of the 5th inst. It appears that a plan had been formed sometime previous to the celebration, for closing the evening with a ball, & knowing that this would be disapproved of by many the thing was kept secret, and as the company of such would not be desirable, it was of course necessary to dismiss them. To effect this object, the toasts were hurried through with business-like despatch, and just as the appetites of many were fairly whetted for enjoying a pleasant evening in social chat, a gentleman rose and made some remarks about adjourning: this hint not being taken, as all were not in the secret, a second gentleman followed, and gave for a toast, "Our Homes;" a third proposed that while drinking this toast, "we resolve ourselves into a standing committee." This being complied with, a simultaneous movement towards the door was made by the initiated, and the assembly dissolved.

Was such a clandestine measure honorable? The entertainment was a citizen one. Ought not the whole proceedings to have been open and fair? Could not those who desired the Ball, have chosen an evening which would not have interfered with the rights and pleasures of others!

If another entertainment should be given, I beg leave to suggest the propriety of sending a deputation to the tavern-keeper, to make inquiry as to the length of time his house is to be at the service of the company. Such a proceeding would be rather new, to be sure, but not altogether unnecessary, as "mine host" of the North Temperance House might otherwise think best to toast his own guests "home" as he did those of his neighbor the other evening.

I would respectfully propose, too, that any further services of the gentlemen who formed the Committee of Arrangements, may be dispensed with, at least until they have learned how to fulfil a trust reposed in them in a manner somewhat more honorable, and without disgracing themselves, or insulting their fellow-citizens.

Mr. Spear was highly deserving of the many compliments he received for the elegant arrangements of his table, and very fine supper; and though he was certainly wrong in consenting to the above mentioned management, yet it is sincerely hoped his house will sustain no injury thereby, as doubtless he was more sinned against, than sinning. Before bidding adieu to the subject, I would just say, that the real friends of the Temperance cause ought rather, on such occasions, to seek to forward its interest, than to gratify their own particular fancies.

ONE OF THE DISMISSED.

Destitute Churches.

MR. EDITOR—In reading your paper, I observed in one of the numbers a number of questions. Among the many, one was "Why are so many of our churches without Pastors?" To this question I have never seen any answer. It is a question of serious inquiry, and a subject that has long been a source of serious meditation to me for years. There are reasons why those destitute churches have not Pastors to break unto them the word of life: and either the guilt will rest upon the churches, or upon the ministry. That God has made it necessary for churches to have Pastors after his own heart, cannot be disputed: and the Apostles deemed it necessary to ordain Elders in every city. And have the churches become more pure and wise since the Apostles' day? And has she learned that Pastors are unnecessary? No! the history of those churches, and the appearance of their sanctuaries, and the downfall of their benevolent efforts, with their yearly statistics, tell to us too well the tale of wo, that "mene tekel" is written upon her, in blazing characters that portray evils to come. If the means that are in our possession be rightly used, ministers will be multiplied as fast as churches. But we cannot expect God's blessing in the advancement of his cause any farther than what the church are instrumental in using lawful and right means. And I despair of ever seeing our denomination prosper until the ministry is rightly appreciated, and honestly sustained.

Poverty is the plea that many churches make why they have not made an effort to obtain a minister. This may pacify conscience, but it will not justify them in the sin of covetousness, nor save those sons and daughters from ruin that are growing up in ignorance and sin, and losing all relish for the house of God. Every church numbering fifty or sixty members, with the assistance they can obtain from others in their several neighborhoods, can support a minister comfortably, if they appreciate his labor as they ought.

Another plea is we want a minister, but we want God to call one for us. We do not believe in these men-made calls. No minister of sense, while he has the wide world before him, will ever impose himself upon a church unless they can do as much as to invite him. And much is said about God's calling ministers thus and thus. We find but little about it in the bible; but it is faithfully recorded in the traditions of the church. No church has ever flourished with which I have been acquainted without the preached word. Churches without settled Pastors have flourished under the labors of an Evangelist for a short season; but there is no permanency, they are too much like the swelling ocean, they rise and fall. But if a church have a devoted Pastor, his business and his labor is to take care of the flock, and his happiness and his interest is their prosperity. And he is diligent in his study to be fully prepared to come to them with a message comforting to the saints, and convincing and heart-rending to the sinner. And he is faithful to see that prayer meetings are sustained in the several neighborhoods. I can always read the character and state of a church from their prayer meetings; and seldom will those be maintained, excepting occasionally, unless aided by a minister; and a minister who suffers his church to live without these, must expect to see God's withering curse upon the people of his charge.

Sabbath schools are one of the auxiliaries to the promotion of the church, and these may be conducted with much propriety by laymen; but they never will have that interest and permanency that they ought to have, unless aided by the minister. Here he may become familiar with the children, and they with him, and instead of fearing the approach of the minister to their houses, they hail it with the greatest joy.

A church cannot sustain a character of respectability in the world without a respectable minister. He gives character to his people; if he is found to be a man of worth and piety, strangers judge favorably of his flock, and they will have an influence in the world accordingly as far as their influence may extend, and they are known.—Benevolent efforts are the life of the church. The history of the church in years past confirms this our belief. Where churches have become remiss in this duty, they have dwindled accordingly. And those churches that pay the heaviest salaries to their own Pastor, do the most for the spread of truth in the world, and they are prospered in religion accordingly: and it requires a benevolent minister to make a benevolent people; and no person can be otherwise and enjoy the love of God in the soul.

It is not necessary that so many churches should be destitute. We have ministers; but where are they? O, my heart pains me when I ask the question. My brethren, I fear that you, some of you have turned aside from your calling to get riches, with which to curse your children. Is it possible that you can be contented on your farms, and in your workshops, or in the walls of your school rooms, when God says go; and from all parts we hear the cry, "come over and help us." Better by far to live poor and toil hard, and at last to hear the applaudit, "come ye blessed," than to ride in splendor, to wear gay apparel, and to live voluptuously in painted palaces, and at last to hear that righteous Judge denounce, "Depart ye accursed into everlasting fire."

My brethren, I know by past experience that it is safe to do right, and it is always right under all circumstances to serve and obey God. But we must look to another set of men to occupy those stations that have been so long vacant. They are your sons that you so dearly love, and for whom you have labored so ardently to have them comfortably settled in life. You must give them up to God and when the church begins to pray consistently for God to send forth laborers into his harvest, then and not till then, will we see those young men coming forth, and breaking loose from all that the world calls good, to devote themselves to a work that will ere long elevate them to be as angels equal.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

News of the Day.

Milwaukie.—This place in Iowa Territory, was settled in 1835. The imports and exports to the present time, as reported to the trustees of the town, amount to more than six million of dollars. The proceeds of the land sales within the district have been more than one and a half million of dollars.

The navigation of Lake Michigan, on which Milwaukie is situated, commenced in 1834. This lake is very deficient in harbors, and since 1834, one hundred and eighteen lives have been lost upon it. The amount of property that has been destroyed is $1,092,550. The number of vessels that have been more or less injured, or lost, is 89.

The Wilderness Blossoming.—In 1834, Chicago, Ill., was a wilderness, with only a garrison to keep back the Indians. In 1836, the whole exports from that city amounted to $1,000; in 1841 they amounted to $348,362. The import trade is worth $1,500,000 annually; a monthly average of 150 vessels enter and leave its harbor.—Chicago Democrat.

—Her B. M. frigate Warspite, with Lord Ashburton on board, has been 46 days on her passage. John Bull should have sent us a better specimen of his war craft, if he thought of scaring us.

Hon. William Slade publishes a card in the Intelligencer, expressing his great surprise at the proceedings of the House in censuring Mr. Giddings, and declaring that he "stands ready, here and every where, now and forever, to maintain and defend" the resolutions offered by Mr. Giddings.

The Spanish brig of war Cabano, captured a Portuguese slaver off St. Jago, a short time since, containing 320 slaves.—This is the first slaver ever captured by a Spanish man of war, and speaks well for their determination to abolish the traffic.

INVASION OF TEXAS.

Late from Texas.—By the arrival of the steamboat Col. Woods, from Galveston, whence she was despatched on the 22d, brings the confirmation of the invasion of Texas by an overwhelming Mexican force. It appears that the retreat of the Mexicans from San Antonio was a device to allure the Texan troops assembled in haste, to go in pursuit before they were fully drilled and disciplined.

Shortly after the steamship Neptune left Galveston, (which vessel reported the retreat of the Mexicans from San Antonio,) an express arrived, bringing intelligence of the advance of 9,000 men on the Matamoras road toward Victoria, and reporting 12,000 additional troops on the upper road, marching upon San Antonio. The forces which recently captured San Antonio, constituted the van guard of the 12,000 under command of Vasques. The impression is, that the Texian army of 1,500, under Burleson, will follow the retreat of the van guard until brought within the power of the main army.

Upon the receipt of this news, which was brought to Matagorda from different directions, rendering its truth indisputable, the Committee of Vigilance in Galveston despatched a pilot boat to this city, and a few hours afterwards the steamer Colonel Woods. The pilot boat has not reached New Orleans. The Col. Woods met with favorable weather and came to our Levee in about 50 hours.

From the Galveston Advertiser of the 22d ult.

The following reached us this morning by Mr. S. Mussine, who left Matagorda at noon, on Saturday. It will be observed that the facts stated are from two distinct sources.

To the Citizens of the Eastern Counties:

We, the Committee of Safety of the county of Matagorda, present to your consideration the following facts just received. From letters dated the 16th inst., from men in whom we have the utmost confidence, we extract the following—from Mr. Pleasant to his sister, Mrs. Fisher, dated Victoria, 16th inst., "From Mexico, information received on the 15th, there would be 1,500 men at San Patricio, the advance guard of 9,000.

[Here follows extracts from other letters, corroborating the statements given above, "that there were 9,000 Mexicans advancing on the lower country, by the Matamoras road, and 12,000 on the road to San Antonio."]

From the above facts, if there is not a prompt turn out by the Middle and Eastern counties, the enemy will ravage and overrun our country.

Matagorda, March 19, 1842.

Trouble in Rhode Island.—The difference between the two parties in R. I., upon the Constitution. Fearing the friends of the new Constitution would proceed to organize the government of the State in accordance with its provisions the Legislature on the 2d inst. passed an act pronouncing severe penalties against any persons who shall hold any county or town office, or accept a nomination for any such office, under any pretended new Constitution; and declaring that any one who shall act in any legislative, judicial, or ministerial office under such Constitution, shall be deemed guilty of treason and be imprisoned for life. This has created great excitement among the people, and letters from that State say that there are two thousand men pledged to defend at all hazards the candidates under the new Constitution. The Governor of the State has issued orders to have reported the number of men fit for duty and the arms and ammunition on hand. He has also issued an order through the Adjutant General that the military throughout the State hold themselves in readiness to appear armed and equiped at thirty minutes' warning. The other party is rapidly organizing.—N. Y. Tribune.

Second Arrest of Hogan.—This individual was again arrested at Rochester last week on a charge of being concerned in burning the Caroline. On Saturday last, he was under examination, and great excitement prevailed. The examination was to be resumed on Monday morning. Meanwhile, a special message was despatched to inform Sir Charles Bagot, the Canadian Governor, of Hogan's arrest. The Rochester Post expresses the belief that he will be set at liberty.

Tremendous Overflow.—The Vicksburg Sentinel of Monday says: "The reports from above are most alarming. We learn from the passengers that all the tributary streams of the Mississippi are full to overflowing. The Arkansas, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, Ohio, Missouri and upper Mississippi were all full. Such a circumstance never occurred before; and when it is recollected that the river at this point is higher than it has been for two years past, a most appalling overflow is inevitable. We learn that Mr. McNutt's place, a few miles above Milliken's Bend, is already under water, and that he had to take his family off in a boat."

Law Decisions.—The Sangamon (Ill.) Journal of the 18th ult. says that Judge Treat, one of the associate Judges of the Supreme Court of that State, has decided that the act passed Jan. 27th, 1842, providing that every negro in the State without a certificate of freedom shall be deemed a runaway slave, and his services may be hired out, is unconstitutional and void. A negro arrested under the law prayed for a writ of habeas corpus, and obtained his discharge.

Another negro, who had resided in the place for two or three years, was seized by a man from Arkansas, who claimed him as his slave. Judge Treat required that he should first prove his claim to him by disinterested witnesses.

Horrid Tragedy—Murder of an Actor.—A most horrid and fatal tragedy was enacted at the theatre last night. After the curtain had dropped at the conclusion of the first piece, a quarrel ensued behind the scenes between Mr. Ewing and Miss Hamblin, both attached to the theatre, in which the latter plunged a dagger to the heart of Mr. Ewing, which caused almost instant death. After the perpetration of the fatal deed, Miss Hamblin made her escape by jumping out at the window, and at 12 o'clock last night had not been arrested. She left in her theatrical attire, dressed as a page.—Mobile Chronicle, March 26th.

Death of Adams the Murderer.—James Adams, indicted for the murder of his wife, died in the city prison about 10 o'clock on Tuesday night, after a short illness, of typhus fever. He was attended regularly by Dr. Tonnelier, the physician for the prison, and visited by Dr Archer, the coroner. During his illness he appeared to labor under great mental and physical prostration, and refused to partake of the nourishing food recommended by his physician. It was not deemed necessary to hold an inquest on the body, and he was interred by virtue of the usual certificate, certified by the coroner. He has thus escaped trial before an earthly court, and gone to appear before a Judge from whose decision there is no appeal.—N. Y. Sun.

From Havana.—By the arrival of the steamship Alabama, we have received our files of Havana papers to the 16th of March. The Government of this Island, says a private correspondent, seems to have come at last to the determination not to suffer any longer the import of slaves from Africa. This evinced by the following fact:—"The Spanish brig of war Cubano captured on the 10th February, off Porto Rico, the schooner Aelia, abandoned by her officers and without papers, under the Portuguese flag, with 212 persons on board. The vessel and cargo entered the port on the 6th inst. accompanied by the Cubano. The prize is awaiting the decision of the Government."—N. O. Bee.

Our State Debt.—It will be seen that the bill for the payment of the domestic creditors of the State in six per cent. stock, has passed the House, and will be sent to the Senate. Our State debt promises very soon to exceed $40,000,000.—Phila Enquirer.

Manufactures.—The whole amount of capital invested in the manufacture of cotton in the United States, is $51,102,359, and in the manufacture of wool $15,765,124. The whole number of cotton factories is 1210—number of persons employed in them 72,119. Whole number of woolen factories 1420—number of persons employed in them 21,342. In both the cotton and woolen manufacture Massachusetts stands first.—N. Y. Sun.

Gen. Gaines, we hear, is on a tour of inspection—first in the northwest as far as Detroit—to proceed thence southwardly through his division.

The Philadelphia Chronicle says that Hosea J. Levis, the absconding Cashier of the Scuylkill Bank, has been arrested at New Orleans, and will soon be brought back to Philadelphia.

Hon. D. D. Barnard publishes a card in the Intelligencer, saying that he refused to vote on the resolutions censuring Mr. Giddings, because he believed the House had assumed a power which did not belong to it.

On the 11th ult., a child of Mr. Webber, of Foster, of R. I., was poisoned to death by eating the caps from the ends of a bunch of friction matches.

Missionary Agent.

To the eastern churches and others who may be directly interested, Brother Sherman S. Griswold, an evangelist minister in this church, (Piscataway,) has been appointed a missionary and agent by the Executive Committee of the Missionary Society, to travel and preach the gospel and collect funds for the benefit of the Society, that the gospel may be sent to the destitute churches and settlements where our brethren may be located. His journey and labors will be through New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Rensselaer county, &c., and as his mission is one of great moment, he hopes that as the time allotted him is short, that the people will be in readiness when he comes among them, to assist him in his noble enterprize—especially the ministers, that he may accomplish much in a short time, and that his efforts may bring a new era among us upon the subject of missions. And as Mr. Griswold is a stranger in the denomination, we would say, that we think him fully competent for the duty assigned him, and hope that he will receive that hearty reception with ministers and people where he may travel that his station and calling demands.

Cor. Sec. of the Missionary Society.

NOTICE TO INSPECTORS OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

The time for the commencement of the Summer Term is near at hand.

It is recommended to the County Superintendent to assemble the teachers as often as may be, at convenient places, that they may communicate with him and each other on the best modes of promoting the success of their schools, By comparing their views respecting the manner of teaching, the government of schools, and the various topics of practical duty, they will eventually derive much benefit.

In accordance with the above recommendation, I will meet the teachers of the several Towns in the following order:

Nelson, April 18, at H. Anderson's Erieville.
De Ruyter, 19th, at Gage's.
Georgetown, 20th, at Moseley's.
Lebanon, 21st, at Campbell's
Hamilton, 22, at the Eagle Tavern.
Eaton, 23, at the Washingtonian House, Morrisville.
Madison, 25th, at Curtis's.
Brookfield, 26th, at S. Woodworth's, Clarkesville.

To economize time, labor, and expense, I propose that the Inspectors meet and examine the teachers in the early part of the day, and I will endeavor to meet them at 1 o'clock P. M.

The attendance of all the teachers is earnestly and respectfully solicited.

E. MANCHESTER, Dep. Sup't.
March 24, 1842.

TO SCHOOL TEACHERS.

The Inspectors of Common Schools for the town of De Ruyter, will meet at the house of Wm. C. Gage on Tuesday the 19th inst., at 9 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of examining Teachers. It is quite desirable that all who design teaching in this town the present season, should be present on the occasion, as the Deputy Superintendent of Common Schools will meet with them in the afternoon of that day.

The School Commissioners are respectfully invited to meet with the Deputy Superintendent on that occasion.

JOSEPH W. SEXTON,
ALONZO H. BURDICK,
Inspectors of Com. Schools.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

MARRIED,

On Sunday, the 10th inst., by the Rev. Thomas Parington, Mr. WILLIAM COGGSHALL and Miss ESTHER BLANCHARD, both of Truxton.

DIED,

In this village, to-day, of scarlet fever, EMMA L., second daughter of Lauren H. and Lucy Ann Babcock, aged 3 years. The funeral exercises will take place at the S. D. B. Church to-morrow, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

In Truxton, on the 10th inst., of typhus fever, Miss M. LOUISA, only daughter of John R. and Lurania Butts, aged 10 years.

Sister Butts had been for two years a member of the S. D. B. Church of Otselic. In her life she exhibited the excellent traits of the Christian, and in her death the value of early piety.

In Cazenovia, on the 3d inst., GIDEON ANTHONY, in the 89th year of his age. Mr Anthony was a soldier in the American Revolution.

In Brookfield, March 12th, RHODA BEAURHYTE, in the 22d year of her age.

Sister Beaurhyte had been a member of the S. D. B. Church for about six years, and had given full evidence of her decided attachment to the Savior. Her death was sudden; yet, we trust, she was prepared for her exit, and has entered upon a state of existence in bliss that will never terminate. S. B. C.

In Gibsonville, Livingston co., N. Y., on the 19th of February last, Miss SUBMIT GRIMES, after a long sickness, of consumption, aged 34 years.

Miss Grimes was a very pious young lady, and was endeared to all who knew her, by her amiability and kindness. She has written many articles for our paper, which gave evidence of much merit and talent. We learn that she gave sufficient evidence to all who stood by her bedside in her dying moments, that she was about to rest in the arms of her Savior. Her last work was in writing for the Register. The memory of the just is blessed.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51:12

UNITED STATES' INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.
CAPITAL,
ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!
Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.
CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,
COMBINING
FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE
SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $600,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

POETRY.

From the Baptist Advocate.

PAUL PREACHING AT ATHENS.

He stood before the assembled throng—
The glory of their age;
The sons of science and of song—
The heathen saint and sage.

Upon the grave of Greece he stood,
And held the chastening rod,
To preach—baptized in sacred blood—
The gospel of his God.

Unawed in Athens' hall of fame,
His glorious accents rung;
The temple trembled at the name
Of Jesus from his tongue.

The fanes of proud philosophy
Were crumbled in his sight;
While o'er the world of liberty,
Shone Beth'lem's star of light.

The sages listened to the word,
By heathen hearts abhorred;
And trembled as they heard and learned
The glory of the Lord.

The ancient idol's hour had came
To crumble and decay;
The Delphi oracle was dumb—
The priestess passed away.

A suffering Savior's love was told,
His banner was unfurled:
Redemption's record was enrolled
Around a dying world.

Where clouds upon Olympus rise,
And rolled the thunder's tones:
The Grecian gods forsook the skies,
And left their golden thrones.

On that benighted nation rose,
More bless'd than learning's light;
The star, the shouting shepherds chose
To shine upon their night.

Hail, happy hour! when to the world
The gospel shall be given,
When vice shall be by virtue hurled,
And hope shall dwell in heaven!

When Turk and Tartar shall adore
Before the power above;
The Æthiop and the Arab own
A Savior's lasting love!

Hail, glorious child! when all mankind
Shall bow beneath his love,
And in one faith, and with one mind,
Shall feel the grace of God.

THE GRANDEUR OF GOD DISPLAYED IN THE HEAVENS.

BY THOMAS DICK, LL. D.

A very slight view of the planetary system is sufficient to impress our minds with an overpowering sense of the grandeur and omnipotence of the Deity. In one part of it we behold a globe fourteen hundred times larger than our world, flying through the depths of space, and carrying along with it a retinue of revolving worlds in its swift career. In a more distant region of this system, we behold another globe of nearly the same size, surrounded by two magnificent rings, which would enclose five hundred worlds as large as ours, winging its flight through the regions of immensity, and conveying along with it seven planetary bodies, larger than our moon, and the stupendous arches with which it is encircled, over a circumference of five thousand seven hundred millions of miles.

Were we to suppose ourselves placed on the nearest satelite of this planet, and were the satelite supposed to be at rest, we should behold a scene of grandeur altogether overwhelming; a globe filling a great portion of the visible heavens encircled by its immense rings and surrounded by its moons, each moving in its distinct sphere and around its axis, and all at the same time flying before us in perfect harmony with the velocity of 22,000 miles an hour. Such a scene would far transcend every thing we now behold from our terrestrial sphere, and all the conceptions we can possibly form of motion, of sublimity and grandeur. Contemplating such an assemblage of magnificent objects moving through the ethereal regions with such astonishing velocity, we would feel the full force of the sentiments of inspiration,—"The Lord God omnipotent reigneth. His power is irresistible; his greatness is unsearchable; wonderful things doth he which we can not comprehend."

The motions of the bodies which compose this system, convey an impressive idea of the agency and the energies of omnipotence. One of these bodies, eighty times larger than the earth, and the slowest moving orb in the system, is found to move through its expansive orbit at the rate of fifteen thousand miles an hour; another twenty-nine thousand miles in the same period, although it is more than a thousand times the size of our globe; another at the rate of eighty thousand miles, and a fourth with a velocity of more than a hundred thousand miles every hour, or thirty miles during every beat of our pulse. The mechanical forces requisite to produce such motions, surpass the mathematician's skill to estimate, or the power of numbers to express. Such astonishing velocities, in bodies of so stupendous a magnitude, though incomprehensible and overwhelming to our limited faculties, exhibit a most convincing demonstration of the existence of an agency and a power which no created beings can ever counteract, and which no limits can control. Above all, the central body of this system presents to our view an object which is altogether overpowering to human intellects, and of which, in our present state, we shall never be able to form an adequate conception. A luminous globe, thirteen hundred times larger than our world, and five hundred times more capacious than all the planets, satelites, and comets taken together, and this body revolving round its axis and through the regions of space, extending its influences to the remotest spaces of the system, and retaining by its attractive power all the planets in their orbits, is an object which the limited faculties of the human mind, however improved, can never grasp in all its magnitude and relations, so as to form a full and comprehensive idea of its magnificence. But it displays in a most astonishing manner the GRANDEUR of him who launched it into existence, and lighted it up "by the breath of his mouth," and it exhibits to all intelligences a demonstration of his "eternal power and godhead." So that, although there were no bodies existing in the universe but those of the planetary system, they would afford an evidence of a power to which no limits can be assigned—a power which is infinite, universal and uncontrollable.

The planetary system likewise exhibits a display of the wisdom and intelligence of the Deity. If it is an evidence of wisdom in an artist that he has arranged all the parts of the machine and proportioned the movements of the different wheels and pinions so as exactly to accomplish the end intended, then the arrangement of the planetary system affords a bright display of "the manifold wisdom of God." In the center of this system is placed the great source of light and heat, and from no other point could those solar emanations be propagated in an equable and uniform manner to the worlds which roll around it.—Had the sun been placed at a remote distance from the center, or near one of the planetary orbits, the planets in one part of their course would have been scorched with the most intense heat, and in another part would have been subjected to all the rigors of excessive cold; their motions would have been deranged, and their present constitution destroyed. The enormous bulk of this central body was likewise requisite to diffuse light, and attractive influence throughout every part of the system.

The diurnal rotations of the planets evince the same wisdom and intelligence. Were these bodies destitute of diurnal motions, one half of their surface would be parched with perpetual day and the other half involved in the gloom of a perpetual night. To the inhabitants of one hemisphere the sun would never appear, and to the inhabitants of the other the stars would be invisible, and those expansive regions of the universe, where the magnificence of God is so strikingly displayed, would be forever veiled from their view. The permanency of the axes on which the planets revolve, was likewise necessary in order to the stability of the system and the comfort of its inhabitants: and so we find that their poles point invariably in the same direction, or to the same points in the heavens, with only a slight variation, scarcely perceptible till after the lapse of centuries. As the planets are of a spheroidal figure, had the direction of their axes been liable to frequent and sudden changes, the most alarming and disastrous catastrophies might have ensued. In such a globe as ours, the shifting of its axis might change the equatorial parts of the earth into the polar, or the polar into the equatorial, to the utter destruction of those plants and animals which are not capable of interchanging their situations. Such a change would likewise cause the seas to abandon their former positions and to rush to the new equator, the consequence of which would be that the greater part of the men and animals with which it is now peopled would be again involved in a general deluge and the habitable earth reduced to a cheerless desert. But all such disasters are prevented by the permanent position of the axis of our globe and of the other planets during every part of their annual revolutions, as fixed and determined by him who is "wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working."

An evidence of wisdom may likewise be perceived in the distance at which each planet is placed from the great central body of the system. In the case of our own globe, its distance from the sun is so adjusted as to correspond to the density of the earth and waters, to the temper and constitution of the bodies of men and other animals, and to the great state of all things here below. The quantity of light which the central luminary diffuses around us is exactly adapted to the structure of our eyes, to the width of their pupils and the nervous sensibility of the retina. The heat it produces, by its action on the caloric connected with our globe, is of such a temperature as is exactly suited to the nature of the soil, and to the constitution of the animal and vegetable tribes. It is placed at such a distance as to enlighten and warm us, and not so near as to dazzle us with its splendor, or scorch us with its excessive heat, but to cheer all the tribes of living beings, and to nourish the soul with its kindly warmth. Were the earth removed fifty millions of miles farther from the sun, every thing around us, would be frozen up, and we should be perpetually shivering amid all the rigors of excessive cold. Were it placed as much nearer, the waters of the rivers and the ocean would be transformed into vapor, the earth would be hardened into an impenetrable crust, the process of vegetation would cease, and all the orders of animated beings would faint under the excessive splendor of the solar beams. There can be no doubt that the distances of the other planets are likewise adapted to the nature of the substances of which they are composed, and the constitution of their inhabitants. We find that the densities of these bodies decrease in proportion to their distance from the sun; and it is highly probable that this is one reason, among others, why they are placed at different distances, and are thus adapted to the greater or less degree of influence which the central luminary may produce on their surfaces.

THE DEAD SEA.

It is supposed the river Jordan always flowed where it does now, and that of course it must have fallen into a lake under ground, which was probably beneath the very spot where Sodom stood. It might have been covered over with a crust of earth, sustained by asphaltus, a pitchy substance, which abounds in that region. When Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim were destroyed, the whole shell doubtless sunk.

The sea is now about seventy miles long and twenty broad. It is called the Salt Sea in the Bible, and the name is certainly appropriate; for every hundred pounds of water contain forty-five pounds of salt. On the Eastern shore, it is found in lumps often more than a foot thick, in places which the waters had overflowed in the rainy season. The stones on the shore are covered with a thick crust of lime or gypsum.

Branches, and things which fall into the water from the bushes, become encased in salt.

An American missionary who visited the spot, says: "The water looks remarkably clear and pure; but on taking it into my mouth, I found it naseous and bitter, I think beyond any thing I ever tasted. My clothes were wet by the waves, and as they dried, I found them covered with salt. It has been said that birds cannot fly over this sea; but we saw a great many on its shores, and observed three at a time flying over the water."

Another traveler says: "I went in till up to the knees in the sea, and took some water into my mouth. It was impossible to keep it there. My boots were scarcely dry, when they were already covered with salt."

The missionary found two species of fruit in its neighborhood, either of which might pass for the famous apple of Sodom. One, on being opened, presented a dry pith like that of the corn stalk. The other was very inviting in appearance, but very bitter to the taste.

It is computed that the Jordan discharges six millions of tons of water into it daily, yet it has no visible outlet, and its waters vary but little in height. The Arabs think its water evaporates; but many learned men who have written about it, think there must be an opening under ground, through which its waters were discharged. But this opinion seems to be disproved by recent observations made by a committee of English gentlemen. They have ascertained that this mysterious lake is fourteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean. The plains around it must therefore be the lowest land on the face of the earth!

Thus this tomb of a guilty race seems wrapped in impenetrable mystery.

A thinking reader may here inquire if the waters of the Dead Sea cannot evaporate as well as those in the ocean, for all the rivers in the world flow into that, without making it rise above its banks. It is true they can; but what became of the water before Sodom was destroyed? Some one may inquire if they did not flow down into some channel which entered the Mediterranean more than fourteen hundred feet below its surface. Philosophy will teach the inquirer that this is impossible. If there is an opening in the earth connecting the two seas, the waters must rise to the same level in both, just as they do in a coffee pot and its spout.

Here is room for philosophers to speculate and investigate. We hope the mystery, like many others, will lead to the discovery of truths which will make us admire the works of God more and more.

CAUGHT AT LAST.—One of the members of our society, who had been delegated to attend a meeting in a neighboring town, in giving his report at the weekly meeting on Wednesday evening last, related the following incident:

An individual in the meeting was personally appealed to by the lecturer in private conversation while the pledge was being circulated, and urged to give his name to the cause. He resolutely refused, and declared his firm determination not to sign the pledge; it was all fanaticism; he could take care of himself; and needed no pledge to bind him. After the pledge had been thoroughly circulated through the house, it was proposed that the names obtained should be read, which was accordingly done. The individual above referred to manifested no little surprise in hearing the name of his daughter announced—then his son—and finally, when the name of his wife was read, he could set still no longer, but rising from his seat, he requested that his own name might be placed on the list, adding, that they might as well have the whole family—he would not be left alone.

Here is a striking instance of the influence which children may exert on their parents; and it should operate as an encouragement, especially to the children of intemperate fathers.—Fountain.

ASHAMED TO SING!—A silly fashion prevails which deems it ungenteel to sing in church. To suffer the voice to be heard swelling the praises of God in the great congregation, would be accounted decidedly vulgar; and, in some cases, to join the choir and bear the reproach of a "psalm-grinder," (that is the contumelious epithet,) were to lose caste entirely. A spurious diffidence and mock modesty may restrain a few, but the "fear of man" actuates far more; such is the tyranny of viscious custom. Many a lady, who, with slight but not unaffected bashfulness, can stand up bare-faced, and it may be bare-necked, in all the glare of a modern gorgeous drawing room, and sing a mawkish love-ditty, before an admiring throng of the well-dressed votaries of dissipation, will feel ashamed—yes, although bonneted and veiled, will feel positively ashamed to open her mouth in the house of God. What hope can be entertained for the restoration of congregational singing, while so deadly a feeling as this, prevails among a large portion of those who profess and call themselves Christians? O! that they would ponder upon the awful words of our Savior, Christ, "whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels." (Mark viii. 38.)—Prof. Hodge.

A LAUGHING PRIEST.—As Stephens was looking at the ruins of Quiche, a stranger came "stumbling along under a silk umbrella," with a broad-brimmed black, glazed hat, an old black coat reaching to his heels, glossy from long use, and pantaloons to match, a striped roundabout, a waistcoat, flannel shirt, and under it a cotton one, perhaps washed when he shaved last, some weeks before." As Stephens' and his companions descended from the ruins, the facetious cura laughed to see them grope their way down. He pulled out papers of cigars and then laughed.—He laughed at the idea of Stephens' coming to see the ruins, and said that he himself laughed prodigiously when he first saw them. He had witnessed the blowing up of the French and Spanish fleets from the shores of old Spain, and he laughed when he thought of it. "Lord Nelson was killed—all for glory—and he could not help laughing." He told how he had left Spain to get rid of wars and revolutions—had sailed away with twenty Dominican friars—had been chased by a French cruiser into Jamaica. "Here we all laughed," says Stephens, "the cura's laugh was so rich and expressive that it was perfectly irresistible." He laughed at the wars of his country—at its politics—at its public men—at the world itself "outrageously." Stephens and his companions went on measuring the ruins—the padre trotted on, "talking and laughing all the time."

The famous John Wesley said that he never knew an instance where wealth amassed by the sale of intoxicating liquors, descended to the fourth generation.

The Washingtonians have hired the Franklin Theatre, in New York city, for three years, as their grand rendezvous.

If we had no faults ourselves we should not take pleasure in observing those of others.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand, ready to testify.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

RISE AND FALL OF MOHAMMEDANISM.

BY REV. SAMUEL W. FISHER.

In the opening of the seventh century, there sprang up, amidst the deserts of Arabia, a system of religion which, from that day to this, has presented one of the most formidable obstacles to the advance of Christianity. Its theology is one bold, grand truth, enforcing an equally bold lie—"There is but one God." This was the thunderbolt Mohammed hurled among the idols of Mecca. "Mohammed is his prophet." This was the imposition which gave to this TRUTH the demonstration of the sword. Here has ever been the secret of Mohammed's success. He was a prophet, through whom heaven blazed forth its revelations to an idolatrous world. He was a chieftain commissioned to enforce the will of heaven by the terror of arms. In establishing his system, he brought to his aid two of the most powerful and most permanent passions of our nature. He roused the ardor of war; he awoke the enthusiasm of religion, and, as if to insure the perpetuity of their union, he consecrated the first by the authority of the second, and gathered around the unholy alliance all the attractions of sensuality and ambition. Inspired by such a religion, it is not a matter of wonder that the fiery Saracen, sweeping in a whirlwind over Western Asia, over Africa and Spain, should have dashed down the pagan's idols, trodden in scorn upon the corrupt institutions of a degenerate Christianity, and ended by the establishment of one of the most powerful dynasties that ever swayed the scepter of dominion.

The situation of this system of religion, which, but a few centuries ago, shook the mightiest thrones in Europe to their base, is full of encouragement to the Christian.—Its youth has gone; the signs of decrepid age mark all its movements. The empire shrunk to a tenth of its former extent—rebel provinces resisting successfully the power of the sultan—state after state in succession assuming independence, while the proud son of Othman is forced to crouch before Christian sovereigns, a royal beggar for the political existence of his people.

Other nations around, and mingled with this race, are rapidly advancing in science and power; the Greek, the Jew, the Arminian, are daily rising in intelligence. Mohammedanism alone is sinking into atrophy. Her efforts to rise are the struggles of a man in a morass, which serve only to show her own impotence, and the impossibility of her rescue by foreign hands. Unlike Christianity, which, in the sixteenth century, when the world was breaking loose from her intellectual bondage, with the giant vigor of youth shook off the incumbent mass of superstition, and took the lead of science in the disenthralment of the human mind, Islamism embosoms no elements of revivification. Its religion and its customs are all stereotyped after the pattern of the days of darkness. And as the courage, the enthusiasm, the hardihood of its mountain and desert-nourished youth vanish under the influence of luxury and repose, there remains no vital force to rebuild her mouldering walls, to prop her falling buttresses, to hold her up in the struggle for advancement with the great powers of Christendom.

Mohammedanism is thus retiring before the onward march of the civilized world.—Change she can not without outraging the piety of every true Mussulman, for her religion forbids those changes of government and manners which are necessary to her advancement. If she clings to her ecclesiastical polity, her political damnation is inevitable. If, breaking away from these trammels, she launches forth upon the wild sea of political experiment, then her religion must founder and go down forever.—How long it will be before the cannon which have desolated the fairest towns of Syria and curbed the iron spirit of the rebel pacha, shall be pointed at the seraglio of the sultan, man cannot predict. But the voice of Providence, borne to us on every breeze, declares that the decree against this once terrible power has gone forth. The allied power of all Europe may retard, but it can not stop the descending bolt. The haughty and cruel Ottoman, whose tread of death has crushed the minds and hearts of millions, whose sway has consigned to solitude and decay the garden-spots of earth, whose presence is a moral Upas beneath which science dies, and the living vigor of the immortal spirit withers—that power which has sought only to enslave, never to deliver; to destroy, never to build up, is hastening to dissolution. And when the empire of Othman falls, when once the throne of the sultan, like that of the caliph, crumbles, then, assuredly cometh the jubilee of Christianity over prostrate Islamism. Far and wide as the religion of Mohammed is diffused, its professors, from every quarter of the globe—from the sands of Ethiopia, the mountains of Tartary and the distant shores of China—all turn their eyes with anxious gaze to Constantinople, as the last refuge of their faith. When once the stone cut from the mountain without hands shall strike this colossus—when once its mosques shall echo to the voice of Christian worshipers, the death-knell of Islamism will be sounded over the earth. Not more surely will the arch fall whose key-stone is rent away, than will this huge edifice of religious imposture [illegible]mble into ruins, when once the empire of [illegible] Turk is overturned. It was the Turk [illegible] to the succor of this religion [illegible] dynasty of the caliphs was in ru[illegible] feet. This young, bold, hardy [illegible] infused new life into the re[illegible] the conquered Saracen, when it was rapidly tending to decay. And as the sultan falls into the same grave his ancestors dug for the caliph, what new power will arise to bid the decaying tree flourish green again over their sepulchres?

CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

Union with Christ.

There is another simile frequently used in Scripture to represent this union between Christ and believers, and that is taken from a building, the parts of which are cemented together, and all rest on the same foundation or corner-stone. Thus, Paul, "And are built upon the same foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." And again, "Other foundations can no man lay than is laid, which is Christ Jesus the Lord." Peter, also, "To whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God and precious: Ye also as lively stones are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

This long array of scripture texts may appear to some to be unnecessary, as the point to be established is not disputed among evangelical Christians. To which I would reply, that although the doctrine of believers' union to Christ is not denied, its importance is not appreciated by many; and all these strong expressions are, by some modern theologians, considered as no more than figurative expressions, intended to express the mutual love which subsists between Christ and his people. All idea of any thing mystical and inexplicable, in this union, is scouted as unreasonable and unnecessary. Let the reader judge; the testimony of the spirit is now before him. For our part, we think that this is a real union, a spiritual union, and a mystical union, of which we can form no clear, or adequate conceptions, but by its fruits and consequences. But when we say this, we would not intimate that it is more mysterious and incomprehensible than many other kinds of union with which, as matters of fact, we are well acquainted; whilst of the nature of the bond of connection, we are totally ignorant. This is true of the union between our souls and bodies, between a stock or root, and the branches, leaves, and fruit of any vegetable. But our aim in exhibiting the scripture view of this subject, is not so much for proof, as for pious contemplation. This subject has a close connection with practical piety. If a man labors ever so painfully in his own strength in religious duties, he will spend his strength for nought, and his labor for that which profiteth not; but if convinced that without Christ we are spiritually dead, we come unto him, who is the source of life, then, indeed, we shall have life.

It is not necessary to understand the precise nature of this union in order to experience it and to enjoy its benefits; no more than it is to understand how our food is digested and assimilated, to be nourished by it. That there is such an union, we have seen that the scriptures declare it in the most emphatic manner; and we know that it is a high and holy union. It brings us nearer to God than, as far as appears to us, any other creatures, however high in intellect and powers; yet we have no information that he is united to them, as he is to believers of the human family. Indeed, he took not on him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham. He stands in no such near relation to them as to us, as redeemer, and intercessor. He is not brother to them as to us, by being bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. But the union of which we are speaking, is not merely the participation of our humanity. This relation he sustains to all men; but the union now under consideration, is peculiar to believers, who have the Spirit of Christ dwelling in them. These are the persons, however poor and despised in the world, whom he was not ashamed to call his brethren, and whom he keeps as the apple of his eye.

Any kindness shown to them, he considers as if done to himself; and any injury to them, as a persecution of his own person. Accordingly, we read, that in the last day, he will say to those on his right hand, "I was an hungered and ye gave me meat, I was thirsty and ye gave me drink, I was a stranger and ye took me in, naked and ye clothed me, I was sick and ye visited me, and I was in prison, and ye came unto me." And when they, in surprise, will be ready to deny that they had exercised these acts of kindness toward him, he will stop their mouths, by saying, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."—And to the wicked, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it not unto me." So, when Paul, the persecutor, was struck down to the ground, on his way to Damascus, to seize and bring to punishment all that called upon his name, Jesus spake to him in these remarkable words: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Christ being in heaven, could only be persecuted in his members; but these he considers parts of himself. Whoever does good to them, does a kindness to him which he will graciously and munificently recompense, and whoever injures any one of these little ones, it were better for him that a mill stone were hanged about his neck and be cast into the depths of the sea. The true disciples [illegible]rist have no need to be concerned, or afraid when men rise up against them, for there is one in the heavens who will not suffer a hair of their heads to perish, and takes upon himself their vindication against all who assail them, by whatever weapons.—Let them, then, when persecuted or calumniated, meekly commit their souls to him in well-doing. Their Redeemer is mighty, and will spread his broad shield over them for protection; and if necessary, make bare his arm in their defense, and in the punishment of their enemies. No people in the world are so perfectly secure from all danger, as the real members of Christ's mystical body. No weapon that is formed against them shall prosper, and every tongue which riseth up against them, they shall conquer. And when they die, there is no danger of their being lost, for their glorious Head will gather them to himself. "Where I am, there shall my servants be also. Because I live, ye shall live also." There is one thing in the prayer of Christ, relating to this sacred union which, interpret it as we will, gives a sublime idea of its exceeding great intimacy: "That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they may be one in us." I pretend not to fathom the full import of this petition, but put the lowest sense on the words which they will bear; and still they represent this union to be close and intimate beyond conception. If in preaching we hear but little said, and small account made of the union between Christ and believers, it is a sign that evangelical truth is not thoroughly understood. Sometimes, preachers in expounding the scriptures, in their desire to render every thing level to human reason, while they divest the truth of its mystery, despoil it at the same time of its richness; for while human reason hates mystery, genuine faith delights in it. The spirit of devotion is flat when the object of faith and worship is brought down to our conceptions. Adoration is always most profound when an incomprehensible object is before the mind. God is the greatest of all mysteries.

THE YOUTHFUL MISSIONARY.

I saw a beautiful babe lying on the lap of its mother. Bright buds of promise were clustered in the curling ringlets which adorned her little brow. Sweet innocence played upon her gentle features, while her laughing eye expressed a careless joy. The mother's eye rested for a moment upon the beauty of her child, then raised imploringly to heaven. A tear bedewed her cheek as she committed it to her Father's protection.

Ere this, she had felt that it was not her own, but a gift from Him, and often had silent ejaculations arisen from her heart that He would in future shield the little one from temptation, and guide her in the path of virtue and usefulness. When those bright buds of promise which encircled her brow had blossomed in increasing years, ere any chilling wind or withering frosts had passed over them, but while they were blooming in their primeval freshness, she gave her heart to God. Then she listened to the voice of Him who is the joy of heaven, and turned from the mingled waters of earth, to drink of that pure stream which winds among the hills and plains of paradise. Her former companions strove to allure her to join in worldly pleasure, but she was not attracted by their fantastic drapery. It was too thin its structure was too light to conceal from her view the inscription, unsatisfying, perishing, engraven in living characters upon every object around which it was thrown. She looked not with envy but with pity upon the crowd that worshipped at the shrine of fashion and folly. She turned away and breathed a prayer that they might seek the path of wisdom.

A cry was wafted on the ocean's wave from a heathen shore, imploring the word of life. She heard, and her spirit was moved. It was like the moving of Bethesda's pool when the angel of mercy descended and troubled its waters. She began to enquire, shall those millions be left to perish, while Jesus is on the throne of mercy extending the golden sceptre to all who approach him? Shall the fact that those who love Him and obey his word, are destined to a happy immortality be longer concealed from them? Must it be that those kind words which fell from His lips while he was in the flesh shall never reach their ears, because none are willing to leave their friends to tell them the joyful news?

A voice seemed to whisper to her; thine it is to increase the light which already begins to shine in that benighted place. Her heaving breast often betrayed the emotion of her heart, as the cry "Come over and help us," which was echoed from hill to hill throughout our land, fell upon her ear. The inquiry came, are there no daughters in Zion who will imbibe the spirit of the ascended saints whose remains sleep beneath the Hopia tree? She answered,

"The vows of God are on me; and I must not stop
To play with shadows, or pluck earthly flowers,
Till I my work have done, and rendered up account.
The voice of my departed Lord,
Go teach the nations, salutes my ears, and I will go."

As she mingled in the society of friends whom she tenderly loved, the reflection often arose in her mind, that she must soon leave the refinements of civilized society, and bid those dear ones a final adieu, but she was not unhappy. She leaned upon the Savior who said to her, "Fear not, I will help thee." It was not the love of [illegible]y or desire of fame that led her forward, but the aspiration of a soul renewed by the Spirit of God, who held daily communion with him, to promote purity and peace among the inhabitants of the earth by carrying to them the word of life. When her mother was apprised of her conviction of duty, conflicting feelings agitated her bosom, for she was bound to her daughter by the tenderest ties. Fond nature would have detained her; but in a moment her mind reverted to the early consecration she made of her child to God. Her troubled spirit became tranquil, for she felt that her prayer was answered. Soon the white sails of a gallant ship which lay at one of our eastern wharves were spread, a little group were assembled near, a hymn was sung, a prayer arose in which many pious hearts joined. Then the young missionary sailed for a foreign shore. When the top stone of the upper sanctuary shall have been laid with the cry "grace, grace unto it," bright gems from that rude spot will be seen glistening there, which by her hand were polished and fitted to adorn the heavenly temple.—Ch. Secretary.

SKELETON OF A SERMON.—NO. IV.

PS. xxxvi. 2.—For he flattereth himself in his own eyes until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

If it were not for the disposition of men to flatter themselves beyond what the truth of God will allow them, there would be much more hope in their case.

PROPOSITIONS.

I. Show when sinners flatter themselves in their own eyes.

II. Show that their iniquity will be found to be hateful. And

III. Show when it will be found to be hateful.

1. Sinners often flatter themselves when they contend that the Bible is not true.

2. They flatter themselves in their own eyes when they deny in any way that they are free moral agents.

3. They flatter themselves in their own eyes when they contend that the law is not obligatory on them.

4. They flatter themselves when they deny the distinction between saints and sinners or the necessity of regeneration.

5. They flatter themselves when they endeavor to believe that all men will certainly be saved.

II. Their iniquity will certainly be found to be hateful.

I. Sin is a violation of his law and his law connot be maintained unless sin is made to appear hateful.

2. It is no evidence but that God will maintain his law and make sin appear hateful, because he suffers men to transgress it in this life. This life is a time of probation.

3. It is impossible to see how he can pardon sin unless the claims of his law are sustained.

4. One great object in the Savior's death was to sustain the law.

5. He has appointed a day when he will judge men for their sin.

III. We are next to show when men will find their iniquity to be hateful.

1. Some find it to be hateful by genuine repentance when they are converted.

2. Some find it to be hateful when they come to view it on the bed of death.

3. All that do not repent in the present life will find it to be hateful in the future world.

IMPROVEMENT.

1. How important that every preacher of the gospel should be plain, and strip sin of all its false and alluring colors!

2. Any doctrine by which sinners are led to neglect or delay repentance, may ruin their souls.

3. We see why repentance for sin is indispensable in order to receive pardon or eternal life.

LUTHER.

THE MOST INTERESTING POINT IN A REVIVAL.—Every part of a genuine revival of religion is full of interest. It is the work of God, and though marred and impeded, it may be, by human imperfection, it is still, like all his other works, very good.—But different individuals will contemplate the same revival in very different aspects, and when called upon to specify that point in its progress which they regard as the most interesting, will fix upon very different periods.

The young convert will call that the most interesting time when, by the power of the Holy Spirit he was aroused from his sleep of sin and death, was made to see his guilty and lost condition, and enabled by faith to apprehend the Lord Jesus Christ as his Savior. He will remember with unspeakable emotions the time when his tongue "broke forth in unknown strains, and sung surprising grace."

The worldly-minded backslider who had not noticed any of the tokens of God's approach, and was only aroused to a sense of his presence by witnessing the crowded prayer-meeting, and hearing the cry of the awakened sinner, "What must I do to be saved?" mingled with the songs of the new born soul, will name as the most interesting period, that in which the public mind was most strongly moved, and convictions and conversions were most multiplied.

But the faithful pastor who has for months gone forth weeping, bearing precious seed, and the faithful few who have stood by his side shoulder to shoulder, in Zion's gloomiest hour, and labored, and prayed, and wept with him, will remember with the deepest interest that momentous crisis when an unusual solemnity and tenderness spread itself over their little, lonely prayer meeting; when the inward agony of their souls, that had been for weeks, and perhaps for months, rising, now like a smothered fire that could no longer be suppressed, broke forth in vehement sobs, and groans, and confessions of sin; when they were enabled by faith given them from God, to take hold of his precious promises and plead them at the mercy-seat; when they comforted and encouraged one another, and went forth with new strength to the work of building up the broken walls of Zion—they will remember that little lonely prayer-meeting with the deepest interest, as the germ of the precious harvest that followed.

ILLUSTRATION OF FAITH AND WORKS.

Rev. Mr. Knapp in one of his sermons gave some ideas on this subject, which were suggested to him by a ferry-man. Two gentlemen, who were about crossing a ferry, entered into a warm dispute about faith and works. One of them depreciated faith, declaring that good works were all that was necessary. The other contended against his arguments, and said that faith was the most essential thing. The ferry-man, who had listened attentively to the conversation, remarked that he could settle the dispute to their mutual satisfaction. Here, said he, are two oars; I will call the one on my right hand faith, and the one on my left, works. Now, gentlemen, with one of these oars I will proceed to row my boat. He took the oar called, works and rowed with it, the boat going round and round in the water. He then took the other called faith and performed the same operation. The gentlemen stared, not understanding his illustration. He then worked with both oars and crossed the ferry. Now, said he, put faith and works together, and let them operate together, and the great object for which you contend will be acomplished. They smiled with satisfaction, considering the ferry-man a good Doctor in Divinity, and the dispute ended.

THE PRIEST OUTWITTED.—A poor woman in Montreal, received a Bible from the British agent in that city. A Roman priest, hearing of the circumstance, made a visit, intending to deprive her of the precious gift. He offered five dollars for the Bible. She declined taking it. He then offered her ten, and afterward fifteen dollars; she still declining, he left her. The next day he returned and offered her twenty-five dollars. She accepted the offer, and with the money purchased twenty-five Bibles, which she distributed among her destitute neighbors, under such conditions that the priest could not obtain them.

UNIVERSALISM UNMASKED.—Mr. Editor, a few months since a prominent Universalist minister said to his hearers while preaching a funeral sermon, "You may live as bad as you will, and God will save you."

The above was related to the writer by a Baptist minister, who sat in the pulpit at the time the remark was made. This Mr. Editor, is "Universalism unmasked"—They wish to be regarded as a Christian denomination, and therefore find it necessary to have a show of religion. But the true sentiment is "you may live as bad as you will, and God will save you." How can it be otherwise, if there be no hell beyond the grave, and all are going to heaven? No wonder that men do not become alarmed under Universalist preaching, in view of their lost condition.—N. Y. Bap. Reg.

LETTERS FROM MOUNT LEBANON.

To the Children of Sabbath Schools:

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS—Did you ever read any thing about mount Lebanon, in your Bibles? If you have read your Bibles through, you have found a great many verses in which there is something about it. In the days of David, and Solomon, and Christ, Lebanon was thought a great deal of. It was called "that goodly mountain," because it was so fertile and beautiful.—When Solomon built his splendid temple in Jerusalem, the timber for it was cut in these mountains, and carried to Sidon, or Beyroot, or some other place near by on the sea-side, and thence floated in rafts to Joppa (now called Jaffa,) from which place it was taken by land, about forty miles, to Jerusalem. At the present day, "the cedars of Lebanon," once so celebrated, are but few. I know of only one place where there are any, and many of those are said to be very old, and very large. There are, however, still a great many other trees, and the ground is very fruitful. I am now living in this "goodly mountain," and am delighted with its cool breezes, its sweet water and its delicious fruits. But the people—the poor people! You cannot imagine, dear children, how ignorant, and degraded, and wretched, and wicked, multitudes of them are. Thousands live by begging. A great many make begging their business or trade. Generally, they have scarcely any clothes upon them, and often have no place to sleep, except upon the ground. They know not how to read, and they never hear the gospel. Many of them seem scarcely to know that there is such a being as Jesus Christ; or if they have heard of him, they do not know why he came into the world. It is said that thousands of the people, called Druses, worship the image of a calf. They have a very strange religion—a mixture of Mohammedanism, paganism, and almost every thing else that is called religion. They perform their worship in secret. A great many, even of the Druses themselves, are not permitted to know all about these ceremonies. Only those that are called "Initiated," are admitted to join in them, or permitted to know them. I think that cannot be a good and true religion, which is not for all the people—the poor, as well as the rich—the ignorant, as well as the professedly wise.

Perhaps you have heard of Ibrahim Pasha. He is a very great warrior, and a very wicked man. It is said that he has discovered and taken away the sacred books of the Druses. I suppose he meant it for evil; but perhaps the Lord will overrule it for good, for it is thought the Druses will soon renounce their idolatrous customs, and choose the religion of the Bible. A great many thousands of them are very anxious for missionaries to come among them, establish schools for their children, and preach to them about Jesus Christ. Two or three very interesting schools have just been commenced, and we only want the money and the men, to commence many more. Dear children, have you nothing to give for the poor Druse boys and girls of mount Lebanon? Only think how very different is your condition from theirs. How grateful ought you to be, that you were not born and do not live in a land of such darkness and ignorance as this! You have parents who can read, and who care for your best good. You have schools, and faithful teachers.—You have the precious Bible, and can read it. You have devoted ministers, who love you, and pray for you, and preach to you. O, how many mercies you enjoy! Will you not be thankful, and give your hearts to him who has bestowed so many blessings upon you? And will you not think of the poor children who have no Bibles, no schools, no faithful ministers, no friends to care for them, and do them good? I hope you will think of them, and pray for them, and do all you can towards sending them the gospel and faithful teachers.

Very affectionately, your friend,

L. THOMPSON.

MARTYR.

Little Charles drew his chair to his mother's side, closed the book which he had been reading with fixed attention, and looking his mother in the face said, with much solicitude, "Mother, do you know what a martyr is? I have been reading about one, but I can't tell who he is."

"Does not the book tell you what kind of a man he was? Should you think he was a good man?"

"Yes, mother, but if martyrs are good men, why do they treat them so cruelly and put them to death?"

"They have been despised and put to death on account of their religion, because they loved and obeyed God. They have been holy men, who were willing to lay down their life rather than renounce their faith in Christ. They have gone willingly to the stake, been tied to it, and then bundles of faggots put round them, which wicked men have set on fire with their torches."

"I dont see how they could be willing to burn up alive. Could they not escape from the hands of these wicked men?"

"They could not, my child, unless they denied Christ and renounced the religion of the Bible. They remembered what Christ said when he was upon earth, "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." If they had denied Christ thro' fear of wicked men, they might have saved their bodies and lives for a little while, but they would have lost their souls. They feared God more than men, as we all should. They knew if they suffered and died for Christ's sake, they should go to heaven and be forever happy with Christ."

"Did they leave their wives and children and all their friends?

"Yes, they were willing to give up all for Christ, and could suffer anything patiently, even the most cruel death. They were happy even in the flames, and could sing there."

"I am sure I could not. I don't see how they could."

"If they had been wicked men they would not have been happy. But they were God's children, and he made them happy. Have you not read that he would never leave those that love him? He can make them as happy in the flames or furnace as out of it. If you, my dear son, had a good hope in Christ, was one of his dear children, you could suffer for him. But can you tell me the names of any martyrs? Do you recollect of reading about one in the Bible?

"I don't remember as any one was burnt alive."

"They have not always been burnt to death; some have been stoned, some sawn asunder, and others devoured by wild beasts. Some have been stretched on the rack, and limb torn from limb; others have been nailed to crosses."

"Was Stephen a martyr, mother? It says he was stoned to death by his enemies."

"Yes, he was the first Christian martyr, and you know he died happy, calling on the Savior to receive his soul. The Savior did not leave him in this awful hour. You can read the account in the Acts of the Apostles."

"O mother, I have thought of another, I think: was not John Rogers one? Where is my primer? I have seen the picture of him burning, while his poor wife and children were standing round and weeping."

"Yes, my child, he was one of the many hundreds that have suffered."

"We ought to be truly thankful, that we live in better times. We can love and serve God, and no one will hurt us. We can kneel down and pray to night, and there are no soldiers around the house to break in, and drag us to prison, or to burn us if we do not cease to serve God. Think, my child, who gives you this, and all other priviledges, and him for them."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, April 20, 1842.

"Abstain from all Appearance of Evil."

The Christian owes it to himself and his profession to so regulate his intercourse with men, as to conform to the above quoted language of an Apostle of Jesus Christ. The relation which he sustains to God, and also to men, as well as the important part he is to act in the church, and in the progress and triumph of the gospel over sin, alike demand it. Jesus says of them, "ye are the light of the world."—God acknowledges them as his chosen instruments in evangelizing the world. It is theirs, therefore, to so exhibit themselves as to give no occasion of reproach to the christian name. With the christian it is a settled question, that aside from the religion of the Bible there is nothing valuable, and every deviation from its divine precepts is a departure from right and expediency. The history of the past proves the same thing, and settles the question beyond a cavil, that nothing good in itself and influences can emanate from any other source, or be carried forward by any other means. As soon as the influence of the gospel is felt, it will excite benevolent emotions, and prompt to well-directed, benevolent action. When it is not felt, there is an entire absence of benevolent feeling and effort. The progress of society of itself will avail nothing, nor can society progress otherwise than as it comes under the influence of christianity. There is nothing in man, by nature, of that high and exalted character that will lead him to the exercise of expansive benevolence. Neither can it be shown that there ever has been any permanent melioration of man's condition, nor is there any hope of future good, save from the influence of the christian scheme. It then follows, of necessity, that since the christian is the representative of christianity, that his influence is necessary for the progress of society, and the melioration of man's wretched condition. And he is sacredly bound by the tie that binds him to Christ, to stand forth an efficient operative in every work that will better the condition of his fellows, and bring them under the influence of the gospel.

As a servant of Christ, he is also required to guard the interests of religion, and not suffer infidelity in any of its forms to wear the laurels that it has not won, and which christianity alone is entitled to.—Christianity alone has lifted man from his low degradation. It has civilized and enlightened him, and given him all his social, civil, political, and religious advantages.—Blot out the influence of christianity from men, and every thing good, or desirable, takes its flight, and leaves them in the darkness of untaught nature with all its sins and plagues. Man, free from the influence of the gospel, is like a ship-wrecked mariner shrouded in midnight darkness, and tossed on a bottomless, shoreless ocean, the sport of every wind and wave. This being man's condition, the christian cannot be guiltless when he gives countenance to irreligion, or remains quiet when religion is assailed, or brought into disrepute.

Two things are incumbent on the christian.

1. He is to be in the front rank of every enterprise that is calculated to better men's condition, since the influence of christianity, whose representative he is, is necessary for the progress and completion of any such enterprise. If any who profess not the gospel are disposed to stand also in the same rank, he is to greet them as co-adjutors. But he can not without dishonor to religion stand in the back ground, and thus cause evil to abound.

2. He can not consistent with his high calling, give sanction to infidelity by tacitly assenting to any act or prohibition that in any wise restricts or limits religious exercises or influences. This would at once create an issue between religion and infidelity, and by assenting to it he yields the contest, and religion bows to infidelity obsequiously. The Christian may not enter where religion has no place, nor associate with those that despise and repudiate it.—A better rule for him cannot be found than to do nothing upon which he can not consistently ask God's blessing and direction, nor resort where he must lay aside religion, nor associate with those who fix circumscribed boundaries to religion and its influences. The christian is bound to make his protest against every approach of infidelity, and to show in all his associations with men, that religion has the first place in his affections. Such a course in some communities would bring upon him all the abuse that is stored in the vocabulary of infidelity, and perhaps affect him in his property or reputation, but it will in all times and places give him the approbation of God, and an enlightened conscience.—Christians may always be assured that Satan will rage when his strong holds are besieged, and that every means will be used to bring religion into disrepute. At such times shall christians waver? Let them by all that is excellent and dear in religion be firm, and they will outride the storm, and the lofty mad crest of infidelity shall bow to the peaceful influences of religion. Let the christian ever remember to "abstain from all appearances of evil;" and have no connection with the unfruitful works of darkness, neither giving them countenance, or yielding to their dictation. Then may he be assured that all will be well.

Explanation.

When we admitted the article entitled, "Our Temperance Supper," we supposed circumstances called for its publication.—But since the committee have disavowed any knowledge, or responsibility in the matter, we cheerfully acquit them of blame. We were aware that the report had gone forth that the clergy and other professors of religion had participated in the exercises of the day, not excepting the dance. Our readers will now understand that the ball was no part of the celebration, and that the clergy did not participate in it. The following we admit as an apology for the article of last week, over the same signature.

Mr. Editor,—Understanding that the gentlemen, forming the Committee of Arrangements for the Temperance celebration, utterly deny all participation in the Ball plan, and that their indignation is excited at the idea of such a suspicion attaching itself to them, and, also, that they demand satisfaction for so gross an insult, I cheerfully comply with this requisition, and beg pardon for having accused them of a transaction so dishonorable. At the same time, as some extenuation, I beg leave to plead the somewhat singular circumstances which led to such an accusation. The fact, that for several days previous to the celebration, there happened to be a report in circulation that one of the committee had said: "a fine thing to begin with prayer and end with dancing"—that the remarks before alluded to about adjourning, and the proposal to form ourselves into a standing committee, happened to have been made by two of the same gentlemen—that the company happened to break up at a very early hour, without any volition of their own, and that a ball happened to take place afterwards—the fact that the committee was composed of business men—all these facts led to the conclusion that since it was their duty to attend to the arrangements, they undoubtedly knew what these were to be. I mention these circumstances as an apology for the injurious reflections made upon their conduct in this affair.—Their denial, being sufficiently explicit, must of course free them from any further suspicion of the kind, and the above mentioned circumstances can only be looked upon as remarkable coincidences.

One of the Dismissed.

By a letter from an agent, I perceive that my connection with the Register is not sufficiently understood by every "one." I will therefore say, once for all, that the Register is owned, edited, published, and controlled exclusively by myself, and that all others connected with the office are hired, and have no control in the matter whatever. "Verbum sapienti."

JAMES BAILEY.

N. Y. Legislature.

The Legislature of this State adjourned on the 12th inst., after a session of 98 days; during which time there have been enacted 323 Laws. The session has been the shortest one that we have had for the last twenty years, and the members have been laborious in their duties. Among the laws passed, we notice one upon which considerable action was had at the previous session, that is, the "Bill to extend the exemption of household furniture and working tools from distress for rent, and sale under execution."

The Legislature adjourned to meet again on the 16th of August, to arrange the Congressional Districts.

Eld. Eli S. Bailey has returned to Brookfield, where his correspondents will please address him.

Eld. W. B. Maxson has removed to Leonardsville, Madison Co., to which place he requests all communications to him sent.

Chester Green, of Rodman, is requested to act as Agent for the Register in that vicinity.

To Correspondents.—We have several communications on our table that shall receive attention soon.

Little York, April 12, 1842.

Br. Bailey,—Believing it will be interesting to your readers to hear of the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom, I wish to inform them through the Register that there has been a precious revival of religion in this and the adjoining neighborhoods. The different denominations of Christians residing here, which amounts to six or seven, united in a protracted effort which continued some two weeks, within which time from thirty to forty sinners were hopefully converted to God, and many backsliders were reclaimed. The subjects of the work were of the most part the youth of our place. There were also a goodly number of heads of families, and one individual 60 years of age or upwards. After the meetings closed here, the people of God opened another in the school house on the East Hill, so called, 2 or 3 miles east of this place, which continued about ten days; some twenty were converted there; thence the meeting was removed, or rather another commenced in the school house 2 miles south of here on the road to Homer, which continued about one week, in which time some ten or twelve gave evidence of conviction in that neighborhood; so we can truly say, the Lord has done great things for us, for which we are glad, and have much occasion to bless his great and holy name.

One thing we wish to notice, and that is, we have seldom if ever witnessed so great a degree of union of feeling and effort, as has been manifest during the meetings and revival above named, and still continues to exist so far as we can judge. I would say as an individual, I have abundant cause of thanksgiving to God, as I trust three of my children are subjects of the work.—May reformation never cease till the whole inhabitable earth is full of the glory of the Lord.

Pratts Hollow, Apr. 18, 1842.

In accordance with the directions of the Superintendent of Common Schools, rerequiring me to ascertain of Librarians, Trustees and Citizens generally their views respecting the present Library Laws, I hereby request the Citizens of the several towns committed to my charge, disapproving of those "Laws and Regulations," to call meetings in their respective Districts, and make such suggestions for alterations and amendments as the majority desire, and forward the proceedings to me, on or before the 25th of May next, that they may be forwarded to the superintendent on or before the 1st of June, agreeable to his requirements.

If grievances exist, lose not the present opportunity for their redress.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

Br. Bailey—In compliance with a resolution of the A. S. D. B. Missionary Society, requiring its Agents to forward to the Register for publication, a monthly report of their travels, labors, &c., and having been appointed by the Executive Committee of that Society to labor in its behalf the ensuing season, for the purpose of soliciting and receiving contributions to aid said society in carrying out the resolution of its last session relative to the extension of the cause of our blessed Redeemer, I now forward my first monthly report.

Feb. 27. Attended an appointment for the presentation of my agency at the Salem S. D. B. meeting-house; preached from Rom. x. 15; presented the destitute condition of the world; the great need of disseminating truth; solicited aid for the A. S. D. Missionary Society, to enable it to perform its obligations. Much interest was manifested, and the friends resolved to organize a Missionary Society, but postponed doing it for one week. During the coming week I attended to the settlement of my own business.

March 5. Attended service at Shiloh.—In the afternoon met the Sabbath School over which I have presided the last year; resigned my office as Superintendent of the School. Br. I. D. Titsworth was chosen to supply the vacancy. Gave my farewell to the School. Much interest is taken in this School. Preached in the evening to a large audience at the Salem Church, from Isa. lxii. 1, 2. Felt a more ardent desire to be devoted entirely to the cause of evangelizing the world. At the close a Missionary Society was organized, but not auxilliary, for certain reasons; yet they manifested a deep interest in our cause. May the Lord ever bless this little feeble band.

6. Had an appointment at the Shiloh Church, relative to my Agency. But few attended; preached from 1 Tim. iii. 15; showed that as the church is the "father and ground of the truth," she was in the fullest sense of the term a missionary church, and was bound to aid in spreading the gospel. And that it was because the church had degenerated from that high standard of holiness and missionary zeal in which she was established, that it now became necessary to organize these societies out of the church when they should be in the church. The command to "go and preach the gospel to every creature," was given to the Apostles, and through them to the church, and although some may think only ministers are to go; yet even they require to be sent, and this requires the efforts of the church; consequently, every baptized believer is a member of a Missionary Society, which Society they joined voluntarily, and are bound by the most solemn of all pledges to lend their aid in sustaining the cause of missions. This was doubtless one object in the uniting of christians into a compact body. No member, then, of Christ's church, can innocently stand aloof from Missionary operations. For the extension of the church we should pray and labor; for this our tears should fall, and for this our prayers daily ascend. When will Zion arise and shake herself from the dust? When will she understand the times? Does it not become us as a denomination, who profess to hold the truth as it is in Jesus, instead of sending out some two or three missionaries to scatter them thick through the length and breadth of the land. And has not the time already come, when the banner of the Sabbath should be unfolded not only in America, but in Europe, Asia and Africa? Let but the church act as she ought—let her pour her funds into the treasury of the Lord, and let many of her sons who are now hid behind the rubbish of this world come out, and the song of Jubilee would soon be heard, "that the ransomed of the Lord had returned with songs of everlasting joy." Owing to various circumstances, no society was organized to-day, but was postponed one week.

7. Very rainy, consequently detained at home.

8. Received a farewell visit from Elders Ezekiel Sexton and Clawson. Our hearts burned within us while we conversed about the great cause of our blessed Redeemer.—In the evening preached at Br. A. Heritage's, from Matt. xxvi. 41. A precious season it was. Received $4, for the cause of Christ.

9. Visited from house to house, soliciting funds for God's cause, and obtained $2.—Preached in the evening at Br. Bennett's from Heb. iv. 3. May the Lord revive his work in my own heart.

10. Visited our brethren at Bacon's Neck and collected one dollar; preached in the evening at the school house to a large assembly from Amos iv. 12. May the Lord prepare us all to meet him in peace.

11. Continued my labors, and obtained $1,50; preached in the evening at Salem church, from James iv. 7.

12. Being Sabbath, Mr. Osborn, a New School Presbyterian, preached at Shiloh.—Solemn meeting, many tears were shed.—Oh that the church were prepared for the Lord to come to his temple.

13. Met the Bible and Missionary Society of Shiloh.—Endeavored to enlist them in the cause of my agency, & urged the claims of the A. S. D. B. M. Society, whereupon they resolved to let the Parent Society have the dues of their Society, if I would collect them, to which I agreed.

14. Spent the day in collecting subscriptions for the cause; obtained about $14; delivered a Temperance address in the evening.

15. Did the same, and obtained $4; preached at Br. Smalley's in the evening.

16. Pursued the same business; had very good success.

17. Continued going from house to house upon my business.

18. Attended the funeral of widow Hannah Davis, and visited Br. Caleb Sheppard, jr., at Bacon's Neck; met with success.

19. Sabbath; attended at Shiloh. In the evening preached a funeral discourse at Shiloh. Oh, may the Lord ever bless my dear friends at Shiloh and Salem for their many tokens of kindness shown to me.

20. Met the Female Mite Society, and laid before them the wants of our Society. They voted $10 to my agency. May the Lord grant them abundantly of his spiritual blessings while they are giving to his cause of their temporal earnings.

21—2—3—4—5. Labored to collect, and met with much success.

26. Sabbath; preached for Br. Clawson, at Salem. Administered the element of the body and blood of Christ to the church.—It being the last of my stay with them, we had a solemn time. May we all be prepared to eat bread in the kingdom of our God above; preached in the evening at the same place.

27. Had a season of prayer at Br. Clawson's with a few friends who came from Shiloh to see us start. The tie of friendship, how hard to sever? But when we meet in heaven, no parting hand is given—no farewell tears are shed. Farewell, dear friend, I must be gone, I have no longer to stay with you. Traveled on to one first-day Br. with seventh-day principles, named Bee, he having sent for me to come and tarry with him. Preached in the afternoon and evening. Br. Bee and his family appear like very devoted followers of Christ. He is searching after truth. I should think here was a field that should be immediately occupied. It seems to me the cause demands it. Br. Clawson has preached here several times, and baptized a number of the family who have not connected themselves with any particular church. Much may be lost here by procrastination. My dear brethren, can we let error rear her standard still higher here when a door is thus opened for us to unfurl the banner of the holy Sabbath? Brethren, do you believe the great mass of mankind are now in error, and that you hold the truths? Let us, then, show to the world that we thus believe, by striving to let the flag of our holy day float far and wide. This place is about 22 miles from Br. Clawson's. Cannot our Board reward Br. Clawson so that he could labor there occasionally?

28. Left these dear friends with regret. Traveled and distributed tracts on the Sabbath along the road. Stayed at Jacksonville—endeavored to convince the landlord that bare honesty in deal would never land his soul in heaven.

39. Continued my journey towards East Jersey, still giving Sabbath tracts. Stayed with Br. Jesse Brown—preached in the evening at his house. This Br. lives about 30 miles from any other seventh-day person. Having embraced religion when young, he joined a first-day Baptist Church, and continued with them about 22 years, when his mind was called to examine the validity of the first-day of the week as being the Sabbath, and after three years' investigation with the Bible only, he at last embraced the Sabbath. During the time he never heard of a seventh-day person—At last, having heard of our brethren in Piscataway, he united himself with that church, and still continues a worthy member. For 14 years he has maintained his integrity amidst a region of those who disregard God's holy day. There also is a field for labor.

30. Arrived at East Jersey, the Lord having preserved & prospered me. During my labors in West Jersey, I received $59. 33, for the A. S. D. B. M. Society; $40,80 of which was paid to me, and $17.93 I left to be collected by Br. Estee, and others, by the 1st of August, and to be forwarded to the Society at or before its next annual meeting. I found the friends willing to contribute, if they can be satisfied that their money is expended in the best manner.

Yours, in the bonds of christian fellowship, SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD.

Congressional News.

From the Jour. of Commerce.

Washington, April 6.

Lord Ashburton had his first audience with the President to-day. He was, together with his suite, presented at two o'clock, to-day, by the Secretary of State.—I learn that the heads of the department were present, and that all are very favorably impressed by the unassuming and courteous deportment of the embassador.

What Lord Ashburton's mission will result in, is another question. I must say that the impression is that it will result in no good. The state of the public mind, of the public business, of party politics—all this is unfriendly to a fair and cordial negotiation, and to a peaceful adjustment.—The administration will have no support in anything they may do, either from public sentiment or from party organization. This lack of support will necessarily be felt by them. They can concede nothing, nor yet can they claim anything. They are left only to the alternative of doing nothing. But should they undertake to move one inch towards an adjustment of difficulties, or even to suffer Great Britain, in whispering humility, to pray us to agree to any terms which we may dictate, and which she did once before in reference to the right of search—then, it is plain that there will be an overwhelming clamor from all quarters against the administration.—The only practical course of the administration would seem to be, to refuse and reject every thing—to offer nothing—to suffer the five or six months to elapse without doing anything, to leave it to Great Britian whether to go to war or not as she may choose—for it is certain that we can not.

Let any man who doubts the correctness of this view of the matter, look to the Senate of the United States, as now constituted, and say whether any convention, which could possibly be concluded by this administration, for the adjustment of difficulties with Great Britain, would meet the approbation of either of the two parties in that body?

The Loan Bill.—The Senate, to-day, was chiefly occupied with the loan bill.—The bill is not going through so soon as we supposed. The democratic members appear disposed to dispute its passage as long as they can, unless it should be so amended as to suspend the execution of the distribution law. It is not impossible, therefore, that the month of April will pass off before the Government can realize anything from the bill. In this case, another portion of the treasury notes will become due, and be protested.

Mr. Wright concluded his speech against the bill, showing that the issuing of the stock below par would operate against the credit of the Government, and also of the individual States, whose stocks it would depress still lower. He also objected to all and every one of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Walker moved an amendment suspending the operation of the land distribution bill, and pledging the proceeds of the lands for the payment of the debt, principal and interest. Mr. Walker said the passage of this bill would be a fatal plunge into an abyss of discredit from which we could never emerge. All this disgrace and embarrassment was to be met because Congress had seen fit to make a donation to the States of a source of revenue, which, if properly applied, would meet the debt, and preserve the credit of the Government.

Stevens' Floating Battery.—Mr. Wise then moved that the Committee take up the bill making an appropriation for building a floating battery of iron, which shall be shell-proof and bomb-proof. Agreed to.

Mr. Wise stated that the bill had unanimously passed the Senate, and he did not intend to occupy the time of the Committee by making any further remarks.

The bill was then read and appropriates $250,000 to that object, and ordered the same to be reported to the House.

News of the Day.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE FROM THE AMISTAD AFRICANS.

The friends of the Mendians will be pleased to hear some particulars respecting their safe arrival and prospects. The following intelligence is taken from the Journal of Commerce.

By the British brig James Hay, Price, master, which arrived on Monday morning in 48 days from Sierra Leone, the committee have received letters from the Missionaries as late as Feb. 19th. They arrived out Jan. 15th, 50 days from New York, all well. The particulars of the passage have not come to hand, as the first four letters have not arrived. Rev. James Steele writes Jan. 21st, and Feb. 1st, and Rev. William Raymond as late as Feb. 19th.—The British authorities and Missionaries, and inhabitants received the party very kindly. All their stores, tools, books, the printing press, &c. &c. were admitted without duty, or even examination.

Difficulties seemed to prevent the Mendians and Missionaries from going directly to Mendi. The danger of war in the interior, and of being captured and sold into slavery deterred them. There was some danger that it would be difficult, if not impracticable for them to plant themselves down in the interior, and that they would be obliged to establish themselves near the coast and work back into the interior. The Mendians want to go as near to their own country as possible, that their relations can have easy access to them. They prefer some place in the vicinity of the Gallinas. Mr. Steele had therefore determined on an exploring tour. The Amistad Africans, and from 200 to 600 Kossos (Mendi people,) whom they found at Sierra Leone, were ready to go and settle with the Missionaries wherever they should fix themselves. Dr. Ferguson, the Lieut. Governor, said that if the successor to the late governor, Sir John Jeremie, was not daily expected from England, he would at once appoint a superintendent to go with them. In the meantime he offered to furnish a boat and crew. But the next day, Jan. 30th, Sir George Macdonald, the new governor, arrived. He expressed himself very favorably towards the Missionaries, and those under their charge, and advised Mr. Steele to proceed on his tour, ascertaining the disposition of the people, report to him his success, and state the aid he wished from the British Government. Mr. Steele left on Thursday, without any white men in company, (Mr. Dove of the Wesleyan mission being prevented from accompanying him by sickness in his family,) Feb. 3d, with Cinque, Bau-u, Wu, Fuli-Wa and Covey. They were to have been accompanied by Mr. Dove. Mr. Raymond had received word that they stayed over the Sabbath at York, 20 to 25 miles from Sierra Leone, where there is a Wesleyan Station, and on Monday proceeded on.—They had not returned Feb. 19th, when the brig "James Hay" sailed for New York.

Mr. Raymond writes that they had hired a house for the Mendians, his family, and Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, the colored teachers belonging to the mission family, for four dollars a week. It was sufficiently large to hold all the people and their goods. Soko-ma, one of the Amistad Africans, had agreed to cook for the whole party at two dollars a month, and his clothing. They consume daily about twenty quarts of rice, and a shilling sterling worth of fish. The clothes have to be carried out of town for washing at some brook, as it is too dusty to dry them in town. Mr. R. was employed, during the absence of Mr. Steele, in putting his chisels, augurs, axes, pitsaw, &c. in order, and in getting blacksmithing done. Mrs. R. and her infant daughter had been slightly sick, but Mr. R. says, after a month's residence at Sierra Leone, "I never enjoyed better health than during this time. Thus far I have felt as great energy, both of mind and body, as I felt in my own country, though I cannot endure near as much hardship here as there." Mr. and Mrs. Wilson were well. The Europeans generally at Sierra Leone drink wine, ale, porter and brandy so freely, that there is no wonder they are taken suddenly sick and die. Te-me, the youngest of the three Mendian girls, asked Mr. R. if she might drink palm wine, (which is merely the sap of the palm-tree, and when pure and fresh has no intoxicating quality,) as she had joined a temperance society in America.

Some of the Amistad Africans had been recognized by their countrymen and others at Sierra Leone, viz. Grabbeau, Bar-tu, &c. It is said that the liberated Africans in the Colony are from 66 different tribes, and that the Mendians are the most numerous. The Mendians are said to be warlike, and to sell their captives, &c.

The conduct of Cinque and the rest, (with the exception of the girls, and some of the men and lads,) had not been as good as the missionaries had hoped, particularly in not abstaining from their old licentious habits. Still, the missionaries were full of hope, anxiously desirous of securing some retreat where good regulations might be observed. The Mendians were highly pleased in continuing their school instruction.

Several slave ships had been sent in and condemned.

Charter Election.—The charter election of this city, says the N. Y. Evangelist, took place on Tuesday last. The official returns will be found below. It will be seen that the Democratic Mayor, (Morris,) is re-elected by a large majority, and the Whigs have a majority in the Common Council.

Our returns from the several Wards are given from the Tribune :

Morris's majority, 1760.

Previous to the Election, the Bishop's party had a candidate in the field for Mayor; but on the receipt of the news from Albany, respecting the School Bill, the Bishop's party declared the result "perfectly satisfactory," and on Monday evening met in the several wards, and resolved to unite their forces with the Democrats.

The Common Council.—The Whigs have a decided majority in the Common Council, having elected their candidates for Aldermen and Assistants, in nine out of the seventeen wards. The following are the wards referred to: 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 12th, 14th, 15th, and 16th. Thus have the Whigs a clear majority on joint ballot. They also claim the Eighth Ward, but of this there is no certainty.

Horrid Accident on board the Missouri.—As the U. S. steam frigate Missouri was ascending the Potomac on the 4th inst. she ran aground some 60 or 80 miles below Washington, oposite the harbor of Port Tobacco. Every effort was immediately made to get her off by backing her engines and taking the guns and other weighty articles aft. Lieut. John F. Borden was sent out in charge of a boat's crew with an anchor, for the purpose of heaving the vessel off, when by some means the anchor got overboard, carrying with it the chain cable, which in running out either killed or carried overboard every one of the sixteen men on board, including the Lieutenant, and all perished. The body of Lieut. Borden has since been recovered.

Solicitude is felt at N. Orleans for the safety of the ship Emma, from Bremen. She had been out already over one hundred days, and nothing heard of her. Her cargo is said to be a valuable one.

Commodore James Barron is ordered to the command of the United States Naval Asylum near Philadelphia, vice Commodore James Biddle, detatched. Commodore Barron is now the senior officer in commission in the U. S. Naval Service.

The Lexington (Ky.) Gazette of the 12th ult., states that a man by the name of John Stafflebear, passed through that place on that day, on his way to Illinois. He is now in his hundred and ninth year, was born on the Hudson river, on the 15th of February, 1734—has raised fifteen children, the youngest of whom is thirty-six years of age.

The Circuit Court of Cortland County, N. Y. convened for its March term at Cortlandville on the 29th March, but found no business to do—not a complaint for the Grand Jury—not a cause on the calender.

Murder of Arndt.—We copy the following article from the Miners' Free Press. It will be seen, from its perusal, that Judge Dunn has discharged James R. Vineyard on bail, for the killing of Mr. Arndt, in the Council Chamber of the Territory of Wisconsin. We hold the discharge to be a great outrage on the peace and quiet of that Territory.—Phila. Enquirer.

The Miners' Free Press says that "the argument upon the application for a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Mr. Vineyard has closed. Judge Dunn delivered his decision after a patient hearing of 10 days. The bail was fixed, and the prisoner held to bail in the sum of $20,000, that is $10,000 as principle and $10,000 as surety. The Judge, it appears, gave no opinion in the case, and therefore the public must form their own conclusion of the manner in which he came to the decision he has, that the prisoner was guilty of mere homicide. The people now have the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Territory before them, deciding that a man may arm himself with a most dangerous and deadly weapon and provoke an assault and when so assaulted may shoot down his victim, and escape with the paltry sum of $10,000—a fine of money for a human life, in the country which of all others boasts of its enlightened state and love of correct principles! The assassin, the bloody-minded, the murderer, need not lie in wait for his victim, and commit the deed in secret; but if he can provoke him to strike, it matters not how many may be present to interfere, how many may actually have hold of the assaulter, between and under how many arms he may be obliged to thrust the pistol to reach the heart, he can be bailed, and, forfeiting his bail, can escape ; and probably by some quirk of the law the bail themselves can escape without payment."

Missionary Agent.

To the eastern churches and others who may be directly interested, Brother Sherman S. Griswold, an evangelist minister in this church, (Piscataway,) has been appointed a missionary and agent by the Executive Committee of the Missionary Society, to travel and preach the gospel and collect funds for the benefit of the Society, that the gospel may be sent to the destitute churches, and settlements where our brethren may be located. His journey and labors will be through New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Rensselaer county, &c., and as his mission is one of great moment, he hopes that as the time allotted him is short, that the people will be in readiness when he comes among them, to assist him in his noble enterprize—especially the ministers, that he may accomplish much in a short time, and that his efforts may bring a new era among us upon the subject of missions. And as Mr. Griswold is a stranger in the denomination, we would say, that we think him fully competent for the duty assigned him, and hope that he will receive that hearty reception with ministers and people where he may travel that his station and calling demands.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient ; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

☞IMPORTANT WORK!
NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,
A DICTIONARY OF
Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,
Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.
BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish :—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business ; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES'
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
CAPITAL,
ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!
Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.
CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,
COMBINING
FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE.
SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next ; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured, to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage on unincumbered real estate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash ; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

Sonnet.—Holy Time.

O Thou! by whom eternal life is given,
Through Jesus Christ thy well beloved Son;
As is thy will obeyed by all in Heaven,
So let it now by all on earth be done.
Not by th' observance of one day in seven
As holy time, but of ALL DAYS AS ONE—
The soul set free—all legal fetters riven—
Vanished the law—the reign of grace begun!
Dear is the Christian Sabbath to my heart,
Bound by no forms—from times and seasons free—
The whole of life absorbing—not a part—
Perpetual rest and perfect liberty;
Who keeps not this, steers by a Jewish chart,
And sails in peril on a storm-tossed sea.

Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

Boston, Nov. 1, 1841.

Holy Time.

(Occasioned by reading a Sonnet.)

"O Thou! by whom eternal life is given,
Through Jesus Christ thy well beloved Son;
As is thy will obeyed by all in heaven,
So let it now by all on earth be done." (Amen! and amen!!)

When man was made, tho' innocent and free,
He soon must know he must not idle be;
God placed him in a garden, to him his work assigned,
To dress and keep it growing with fruits of every kind.
Altho' his work was easy, and all his labor blessed,
His bliss was not completed without a day of rest.
So God reserved the Seventh day, as is by scripture shown,
By which all future ages his government might own.
So needful for all people, as he in wisdom saw,
He afterwards engraved it amidst the moral law.
Tho' men are disobedient, and from his law decline,
To all his faithful children he gives it as a sign.

Thy holy Sabbath day, O Lord! we love;
Sure, 'tis the sweetest day of all the seven;
It brings to view that holy rest above,
When all thy happy saints shall meet in heaven.
To meet thy saints on this, thy holy day,
To hear thy word, thy face and favor seek,
Revives the heart and thus prepares the way,
To love and serve our Maker all the week.
Thus adding week to week until our race is run,
Makes out exactly all our DAYS AS ONE.
Against one evil practice we solemnly protest,
'Tis serving God one day in the week, the devil all the rest.
Though sailing here in peril on a storm-tossed sea,
Safe in the happy haven we hope at length to be.

Some think the royal law is too severe,
And wish to find some easier course to steer;
At length conclude that love is all we need,
Rule out the law and put love in its stead;
Quite seeming to forget, true love inspires
In all our works just what the law requires.
Their rule amounts to this, if right I understand it,
We'll do his work from love, but must not be commanded.
The moment he commands us, we're bound in legal fetters;
To love without a law, would seem to us much better.
"If then I be a father, where is my honor gone?" (Malachi i. 6.)
My children, say they love me, but all my laws disown.
To think to love the Lord and hate his law,
Is such a rule as Christ did never draw.
For he that saith I love him, yet doth not obey
His plain commands, the scriptures truly say, (1 John ii. 4.)
He doth but lie, or badly is deceived;
This is the fact if John must be believed.
"THIS is the love of God," he yet again did say, (1 John v. 3.)
All his commandments strictly to obey.
If nothing grievous in those ten we find, (Ps. xix. 10.)
They're sweet as honey to the christian mind.
To think we're ruled by love in such a way,
As frees from obligation to obey,
Whatever rites and forms his word makes known,
Is rating his great wisdom quite below our own.
Those merely Jewish types we readily agree,
Christ took away and nailed them to his tree;
Contrary and against us, Paul did plainly say, (Coll. ii. 14.)
Which can't be said of resting every seventh day.
There is a law, it cannot be denied,
Our Savior said forever must abide,
One jot thereof shall never pass away;
Till heaven and earth shall pass the burning day.
What this law was, most Christians understand,
Could be no other than the ten commands.
For none of these will good men disobey,
Excepting that about the seventh day.
But when God says the seventh, and men say 'tis the first,
Of all bold contradictions, who can conceive a worse!
Sure 'twould be such a novel as no man ever saw,
A king over all his subjects, to reign without a law.
Concluding this whole matter, if scripture all is true,
Fear God—keep his commandments is all we have to do;
For works of every nature, with every secret thing, (Eccl. xii. 13—14.)
Whether they're good or evil, God will to judgment bring.

SKETCHES OF THE OLDEN TIME.

BY J. M. PECK.

Massacre of the Natchez.

The Natchez were the most powerful and intelligent tribe of Indians in the valley of the Mississippi. Their residence is sufficiently indicated by the city that perpetuates their name, though they spread over a considerable portion of the northern part of the state of Mississippi. According to their own traditions, they had migrated from the South, and their manners, customs, and opinions, in many respects, resembled the more civilized Mexicans and Peruvians. They were idolators, worshipers of the sun, had a temple, and an altar dedicated to that luminary, on which a perpetual fire burned. At first they treated the French colonies with great kindness, In 1722, the Chickasaws gave them trouble, and attacked and destroyed a fort on the Yazous. The friendly exertions of the Natchez saved the settlers. The next year (1723) the commandment at Fort Rosalie treated them with indignity and injustice. The quarrel began between an old Natchez warrior and a soldier, about some corn. The Natchez challenged the Frenchman to single combat, who, in alarm, cried Murder! The Natchez turned to depart from the camp, and was fired upon by the guard and was mortally wounded. No punishment was inflicted upon the perpetrators; while, in other respects, the commandant rendered himself odious to the Natchez. The murder of the warrior aroused up the whole tribe to seek revenge, and they attacked the French in all quarters and killed them. At last the stung Serpent, an influential chief, interposed his authority, a treaty of peace was made, and former confidence restored.

The peace served to lull the Natchez into security, and gave the French opportunity to meditate and execute one of the blackest acts of treachery. The Governor, Bienville, ratified the treaty, and soon after, in a cautious and dastardly manner, arrived at Fort Rosalie with seven hundred men, and attacked and slaughtered the defenceless natives for four days.

From this time the Natchez despaired of living in peace with the French, and secretly and silently plotted their destruction. In 1729, M. de Chopart, the commandant at Fort Rosalie, had been guilty of such repeated acts of injustice, as to render an investigation of his conduct inevitable, and he was ordered to appear before M. Perier, who, at that time, administered the Government at New Orleans. But he found means to justify himself, and was restored to the command. On his return, he continued to indulge his malice against the Indians. The act that stung them to madness, was his attempt to build a town on the site of the village of White Apple, a large Indian town, situated about 12 miles below the city of Natchez, and three miles from the Mississippi, and which they regarded as a sacred place. He ordered their huts to be removed, and the Indians to leave the village. Among the fruitful expedients to gain time, till they could unite the warriors of the nation, and devise means to take vengeance on their enemies, they proposed to give to the French commandant, each one fowl, and one basket of corn, for permission to remain until after harvest. They held frequent and secret councils among themselves, and invited the Chickasaws to join them. Notwithstanding their secrecy, one of their chief women suspected the plot and revealed it to a soldier. The plot being matured, on the 30th of November, 1729, the grand son with his warriors, repaired to the fort with the tribute of corn and fowls. They rushed into the gate, disarmed the soldiers, and commenced an indiscriminate massacre. The slaves and a few of the women and children were saved. All the men were murdered. Not a chief or warrior would stain his hands with the blood of M. Chopart, and one of the meanest of the Indians was ordered to kill him with a wooden tomahawk. The settlement contained about seven hundred French, of whom a few only escaped. The forts and settlements of the Yazous and Washita shared the same fate.

The news of this massacre filled New Orleans with alarm and dismay, but M. Perier, the commandant, was very active in devising the means of redress. The French gained the Chickasaws to their side, who furnished fifteen hundred warriors, which were met in the neighborhood of Natchez with a detachment of troops from New Orleans, under command of M. Loubois.

The Natchez expected to be attacked, and had strongly fortified themselves in the fort. They professed to be desirous of peace, and much finesse was employed on both sides. At last the Natchez contrived to desert the fort in the night, and loaded with plunder they crossed the Mississippi, and returned to a position on Red River, a few miles below Natchitoches. Here they erected a fort. M. Perier having received a reinforcement from France, marched a strong force, with artillery, against them. They defended themselves bravely, made several desperate sallies, but were repulsed with great slaughter. Their defense, and their attempts to negotiate a peace were all in vain, and they finally surrendered at discretion. The women and children were reduced to slavery, and dispersed among the plantations. The remnant of this once powerful nation were finally sent to St. Domingo. Thus perished the most enlightened, civilized, and noble tribe of this continent. A few fugitives who escaped the massacre, fled to the Chickasaws and Creeks, and became amalgamated with those tribes.

We have already stated that, the religion of the Natchez was idolatrous. One of their customs was barbarous. On the death of a chief, or Sun, as they were called, and on some other occasions, human sacrifices were offered. Their chief Suns were invested with absolute power, and there were inferior Suns, that constituted a kind of subordinate nobility. The Natchez are represented by different authors, as just, generous, humane, and ready to extend relief to objects of distress.—They were acquainted with the virtues of many medical plants, and the French represent the cures performed by them as almost incredible. Charlevoix, who spent some days with this tribe in December, 1721, gives various details of their manners, customs, and religion, in which he is sustained by other respectable authorities. He also states that on the death of a chief, or Sun, his nurse, and frequently his body guards, to the number of one hundred or more, were put to death, that he might be followed to the "spirit-land" with a retinue equal to his rank on earth. Besides the sun and fire, they worshiped little wooden gods in shape of monkeys and rattle-snakes, placed on the altar. The Jesuits had a mission established in their villages, but we have no evidence of much success in the conversion of the Natchez, as amongst more superstitious tribes.

Anecdote of Father Moody.—Father Moody was born at Newbury, in 1675, graduated at Harvard College in 1697, was settled at York, Me., in 1700, and died at 72 years of age, in 1747. He refused to receive from his people a stipulated salary, and lived with them half a century on their voluntary donations. The following anecdote is related of him in the Lowell Offering:—

"Col. Ingraham a wealthy parishioner, had retained his large stock of corn in time of great scarcity, in hopes of raising the price. Father Moody heard of it, and resolved upon a public attack upon the transgressor. So he arose in the pulpit one Sabbath, and named as his text, Prov. xi. 26. "He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him; but blessings shall be upon the head of him that selleth it."—Col. Ingraham could not but know to whom the reference was made; but he held up his head, and faced his pastor with a look of solid unconsciousness. Father Moody went on with some very applicable remarks, but Col. Ingraham still pretended not to understand the allusion. Father Moody grew very warm, and became still more direct in his remarks upon matters and things.—But Col. Ingraham still held up his head as high, perhaps a little higher than ever, and would not put on the coat prepared for him. Father Moody at length lost all patience. "Col. Ingraham!" said he, "You know that I mean you. Why don't you hang down your head?""

Remarkable Case of Fasting.—In the first report of the inspectors of prisons is to be found a singular instance of long abstinence from food, terminated, however, at last by death, as Cavanah's would have been had he carried out his system of fasting to the last extreme. Under the head of "Ipswich Borough Gaol," the following anecdote is recorded:—"There has been one death in the present year under such extraordinary circumstances, that I venture to cite the case, although not immediately in connection with the subject of the report. William Casey, a native of Ireland, was tried March 9, 1835, for the murder of his child, and was acquitted on the ground of insanity. He then manifested a determination to destroy himself, and every care was taken to prevent him. He then resolved to effect it by starvation, and refused all food. The first ten days he was without a drop of water. On the eleventh day he drank a quart. Then he went for several days without food, and drank a quantity of water again. Food in every enticing variety was placed and left before him, and carpets were laid in the approaches to his cell, in order that he might be watched. He was frequently seen to crawl out of bed and smell the food, and then return. His wife once attempted to put a strawberry into his mouth, and he would have strangled her had he not been prevented. He lived on in this way, taking nothing but water, except on one occasion, during the last five days of his life, when he took a little rum. He died on the 1st of August. During the whole period of his confinement, he always stood, and was never known to sit down when not in bed. His violence was so great as to preclude the possibility of the surgeon's administering nutriment to him otherwise than by the natural channel."—English paper.

MAXIMS.

Injury.—A little wrong done to another, is a great injury done to ourselves. The severest punishment of an injury is the consciousness of having done it; and no man suffers more than he who is turned over to the pain of repentance.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Pity and Scorn.—He that hath pity on another man's sorrow, shall be free from it himself; and he that delighteth in and scorneth the misery of another, shall one time or other fall into it himself.—Ibid.

Beauty.—Remember that if thou marry for beauty, thou bindest thyself all thy life for that which, perchance, will neither last nor please thee one year; and when thou hast it, it will be to thee of no price at all—for the desire dieth when it is attained, and the affection perisheth when it is satisfied.—Ibid.

Promises.—It would be more obliging to say plainly, we cannot do what is desired, than to amuse people with false words, which often put them upon false measures.—Sir P. Sidney.

The celebrated John Hunter was a man of such wonderful diligence, that he has often told his friends, that for thirty years, summer and winter, the sun never found him in bed. He used to say, "I never have any difficulties; a thing either can be done, or it cannot. If it can be done, I may as well do it as another, if I will take equal pains. If it cannot be done I will not attempt to do it."

Intimacy has been the source of the deadliest enmity, no less than of the firmest friendship; like some mighty rivers, which rise on the same mountain, but pursue quite a contrary course.

Of all the marvelous works of creation, perhaps there is nothing that angels behold with such supreme astonishment as a proud man.

The sceptic may easily be confounded by applying to him gospel truths.—Hervey.

In 1840, there were 35,800,000 pounds of wool produced in the United States.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

ROOF'S FOUNDER OINTMENT,

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

HOW TO HAVE GOOD PREACHING.

If we could have good preaching as that, (said a professor of religion a few days since, while returning from a funeral, in C., and commenting upon some remarks made by the minister upon the judgment day,) we might live. I believe that many churches might have better preaching than they do, if there was more religion in exercise among the lay members. How often do we hear church members complaining that their preacher is dead, or not engaged, or does not preach so well as he used to.—Would it not be well for those church members to look to themselves, and see if the fault is not partly or altogether on their own account. Let them, instead of complaining about their preacher, pray for him, and labor with him, and contribute to his support; and they would have much more peace and enjoyment, while sitting under his preaching, than they do. How embarrassing it is to a minister to see meetings for prayer and conference neglected, and that too by the officers of the church; and on the holy Sabbath, for them to let trifling obstacles prevent their attending at the house of worship. Should the minister work in his sphere, and every lay member in his, we should have good ministers, good preaching, good brethren, good sisters, good exhortations, good prayers, and O, what a light then would emanate from the church! How soon divisions would cease, turmoils come to an end. The spirit of the holy religion of Jesus Christ would possess every soul in the church, sinners would fear and tremble under the mighty power of God, and, fleeing to Christ, would find a hiding place from the storm of God's wrath that awaits the ungodly, and a far brighter day would dawn upon us. RELIGIOUS APHORISMS.

The policy of the devil is not only to destroy the present peace of the believer, but to pursuade him, when that peace is gone, that there is nothing better provided for him in the gospel. Does the Christian "walk in darkness and have no light," the devil insinuates, professedly for his consolation, that he is now sojourning in a "land of darkness and the shadow of death," and consequently nothing better is to be expected till he arrives at the heavenly Canaan. Is the Christian groaning in the bondage of sin, the devil insinuates, that he is now in the enemy's country, in a world of temptation and conflict, that this is the precise experience of all holy men that have gone before him, and that he should patiently wait for deliverance till the "time appointed of the Father." Edwards, Brainerd and Payson "were all their life time subject to bondage," precisely similar, and surely we should not have the presumption to suppose that "God has provided any better things for us," than those holy men enjoyed.

"Who is among you," says the Lord, "that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light? let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God." True, says Satan, you must trust in the Lord as required. But you must not expect deliverance, while in this "land of darkness and shadow of death." Payson, Brainerd, and Edwards did not find it till their worldly conflict was over, or nearly so. "Come to me," says Christ, "all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." True, says the great deceiver, Christ will give rest, but not while you sojourn in these earthly tabernacles. Remember the experience of Payson, Brainerd, and Edwards. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you," says Christ, "and make you clean." "I will circumcise your heart, to love me with all your soul." "Faithful is He that promised, who also will do it," says Satan, but not until after you have passed within eternity. Such were the sentiments and experience of Edwards, Brainerd, and Payson. I presume you will not have the pride or presumption to pretend, that you are wiser or more holy than those great and good men.

When Christians credit such insinuations, they are fast bound in the chains of the great enemy. "They are led captive by him at his will." Reader, the great question with you is, will you credit God or the devil? If you will not "stagger at the promise of God through unbelief, but will be strong in faith, giving glory to God," you shall ask what you will and it shall be done unto you." A. M.

PAUL GLORYING IN THE CROSS.

Yes, when he was the wonder of the world for piety, and the most majestic pillar of the church for every thing great and good, even then, he saw nothing between him and hell, but glorying in the cross alone. It was all his salvation and all his desire. Every hope he cherished, was founded on the blood of atonement; and every grace of his character was acquired by faith in it. He saw nothing, depended on nothing, in or about himself, but clung to the cross as simply as the dying thief. What a lesson to all, and especially to those who are afraid to trust their naked souls, to the finished work of Christ. And be it known to you, that in all this silence about every thing but the cross, Paul was not carrying his self-denial, or humility, to an extreme. His conduct was humble compared with that of many; but he did, he felt nothing more than is necessary, when he thus fully put and kept out of sight every thing but his faith in Christ. He was silent on nothing that deserved to be mentioned; for nothing deserves mentioning but the cross of Christ, when the salvation of the soul is spoken of. Indeed every thing we admire about the apostle, was part of that salvation, and the effect of glorying in the cross; and therefore, could be no cause of either. Paul, therefore, owed it to others, to exemplify this fact by his own spirit and habits.

But he owed it likewise to God and the Lamb—to continue glorying only in the cross. The Savior never tires of appearing in the midst of the throne, as a Lamb that has been slain; nor does God cease to be well pleased with the atonement of his Son; nor does the Eternal Spirit weary in glorifying Christ; and, therefore, both as a minister and as a child of God, Paul owed to his Father, who loved him, to the Son, who died for him, and to the Spirit, who sanctified him, to cherish an undecaying; an evergrowing attachment, to the cross. And this he did. He died with noble readiness for what he lived with manly devotedness. He gloried in the cross, when it brought him to the scaffold. He was right; his way was as direct, and his welcome as sure to heaven, as the entrance of Christ, the forerunner, could make them, and that was certain!—Philip.

'A STRAIGHT WAKE.'—A few evenings since, at a prayer-meeting in Baldwin-Place, a gentleman, who had been a mariner, while giving an account of his recent conversion, said, 'I have been like a vessel in a storm upon a lee shore; but now that by the grace of God, I have weathered the point of danger, and have plenty of sea-room, I intend to make a straight wake.'

Beautiful idea! A voyager to immortality, making a straight wake through life's tempestuous sea! A straight wake, notwithstanding all the winds, currents, fogs, false lights, and other perils that lie in his heavenward course! If he executes his purpose, he will do better than many who have made the voyage before him. He will keep a better lookout, better mind his helm, better study his chart, better obey his captain's orders.—Ch. Watchman.

"I MAY AS WELL SPEAK IT AS THINK IT.—We have heard persons use this wicked argument as an excuse for wicked conversation. It is not true. It is indeed wrong to cherish guilty thoughts, but when a child or man expresses them in language—and especially in the hearing of others—his evil influence is increased, and these thoughts do a hundred times more mischief than they would if they had never been expressed.—Suppose a man to say, 'I hate my neighbor and wish to kill him, so I may as well do it, as wish to do it.' Would it not be worse for himself, and for his neighbor and his neighbor's children, if he did really kill him, than it would if he had only thought of it? So it is in speaking of evil words. —Youth's Cabinet.

LOVE OF THE WORLD.

How strange it seems, at first view, that those who profess to love the Savior and his cause above all things else, should ever allow their creature fondnesses to stand in the way of their usefulness in the world. Yet so it is; and this accounts for much of the infidelity that is manifested by very respectable and otherwise moral men. They look at the professed followers of the Lamb, and see them seeking the world's good as eagerly and as industriously as themselves. The disciples of Christ profess to renounce the world, the flesh, and the devil, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly; and, when in direct contrariety of these professions, they court the favor, and seek the riches and honors of the world, the inference, in the minds of the world's people, is, that Christians as eagerly crave things present and perishing as themselves.

It is thus that a stumbling block is often interposed in the way of a sinner's salvation, by one of his nearest and dearest friends.—We need not say that the amount of guilt thus incurred by the worldly Christian, is fearful. Instead of possessing the spiritual life and power which is able to save a soul from death, he exhibits a spirit of worldly-mindedness that quenches every rising conviction of sin in the mind of the sinner, and lulls his conscience to sleep.

Reader! are you one of these worldly-minded professors of religion? If you are, let me beg of you to ponder the awful consequences of your ways. Think, I beseech you, of your solemn responsibility as a professed representative of the Redeemer. Do you faithfully represent his spirit, his temper, his glowing desire for the salvation of souls. CEPHAS.

THE WRECK.—A noble vessel lay stranded on the beach, the sea sweeping her decks, and her helpless crew and passengers clinging to the rigging, and directing their imploring eyes to the shore for help. The storm raged, and ever and anon, a strong wave beating on the shattered wreck, loosed the grasp of some unfortunate mortal, whose strength at length had failed, and sunk him beneath the waters to rise no more. A crowd appeared on the shore, and while many gazed with idle curiosity on the harrowing scene, a few seemed busy in preparations to afford relief to the suffering.—They had, however, a single small boat, and not sufficient courage and humanity to man it. Sad was the scene! how hopeless the prospect of the shipwrecked? Can our sympathies be touched by such a picture? Then let us contemplate a still sadder representation. Millions are clinging to a frail support, and are momentarily sinking into the abyss of woe. They implore help from those who have been saved from the ruin. But alas! how few of those who profess to have been rescued by divine grace, are actively engaged in efforts to save the perishing. The missionary enterprise is as yet but like a small life-boat, poorly manned, able only to pick up one here and there, of the drowning thousands, as they struggle in the agitated ocean. When will the listlessness of Christians be overcome? When will they be induced to make adequate exertions to save the millions who are perishing without hope?—Presbyterian.

DEITY.—Human excellence is blended with many imperfections, and seen under many limitations. It is beheld only in detached and separate portions, nor ever appears in any one character whole and entire. So that when, in imitation of the stoics, we wish to form out of these fragments the notion of a perfectly wise and good man, we know it is a mere fiction of the mind, without any real being in whom it is embodied and realized. In the belief of a Deity, these conceptions are reduced to reality;—the scattered rays of an ideal excellence are concentrated, and become the real attributes of that Being with whom we stand in the nearest relation, who sits supreme at the head of the universe, is armed with infinite power, and pervades all nature with his presence.—Robt. Hall.

AN AWFUL STATE OF MIND.—There are some low, clayey, cold pieces of land, that cannot be made fruitful. The sun and the clouds pour down their kind influence upon them, yet without any good effects. Worthless flags are all that such land produces. So there are some men whose hearts never bring forth any thing that is good. They grow more filthy and polluted the longer they live, as marshy pieces of land grow more miry by the rains of heaven. Poor souls. It will be soon said of them, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." Sinner, grieve not the Spirit of God, lest thou be left in that state in which divine truth will make thee no better, but thou rather grow worse under its influence.—Morning Star.

THE PRAYERLESS CHRISTIAN.

And what is that? a prayerless Christian! Has there a new sect arisen? A Christian is a follower of Christ, a servant of God,—his child—his friend—dependent on him for every good and perfect gift. Prayer is the communion of this follower—servant—child—friend—with that ever blessed being to whom he sustains these several relations.

But that must be a strange follower who never, in all the long and toilsome journey of life, speaks to him whom he follows.

He must be a strange servant who never inquires his master's will—a strange child, who will never converse with him whom he calls his father;—a strange friend who from day to day shuns all intercourse with him whom he claims as such.

Yet such is the strangeness of the course of that prayerless one that hopes he is a Christian. But are there such in all this wide world? We fear there are many. Poor deluded souls! Go with me to that bed of sickness and death. There lies one we had fondly loved. A few days since the full tide of life coursed through his veins. His hopes were ardent; his prospects bright! But mark him now, how changed! Yet we hope he is still alive. We feel for his pulse. There is none—for his heart, but all is cold and still. Our last resort is to see if there is not some gentle breathing. If there is, then is there life; for one dead ceases to breath. But this with all other tokens of animation fail us. We are compelled, though much against our will, to give them up as dead. But "Prayer is the Christian's vital breath."

Here is one who once gave signs of spiritual life; but now he languishes. Yet we hope he is alive. The life of the soul is so precious that it is hard to give him up.

We sit down by him and endeavor to discover his true condition.

He professes strong, perhaps unwavering hope of his good estate, yet there are fearful signs of self-deception, and we would examine the point as those who are set to watch for souls.

We feel for the pulsation of spiritual life. It is not found. There is no fervor of holy love. It is a fearful sign; for the disciples' hearts burned within them.

Does he breath the breathe of prayer? If so, there must be life; and the other graces may exist in a feble degree. But he does not pray, and we must give him up as one spiritually dead.

Reader, are you that prayerless but yet hoping one? Awake from a delusion so fatal —"Call upon thy God," if so be there yet is hope. ERUTHROS.

FALSE CONFIDENCE.

Among the many who cherish the hope that they have experienced a saving change by the grace of God, and have passed from death unto life, there are numbers, no doubt, who are deceived, both in reference to their true characters, and their prospects for eternity. A more dangerous state, or one more truly deplorable can hardly be conceived. To find ourselves disappointed for eternity, when we expected to be placed on the right hand, and to hear the smiling Judge say to us "Well done, enter in o the joy of thy Lord," to have a hope like this dashed with the awful reality, "Depart from me, I never knew you," this must be overwhelmingly awful.

A false confidence may be inspired in the bosom of troubled sinners by various causes, according to the various tempers, peculiarities, and shades of character among men. Some are peculiarly liable to vain confidence, as others are to despondency; some have never had the true grounds of hope clearly pointed out to them, others by injudicious christian friends, and even by ministers, have been told to dismiss their fears, and believe themselves converted; and others still, having heard young converts say that in conversion the burden and distress of conviction are succeeded by joy and a happy frame of spirit, are disposed to think themselves converted whenever a gloomy frame of mind gives way to one more calm and joyous. There is probably no mistake more common than a belief that one is converted simply because he is happy.

No professed Christian, therefore, should consider himself past the danger of false confidence. "Examine yourselves," says an apostle, "whether ye be in the faith: prove your own selves: know ye not that Christ is in you except ye be reprobates?" Is your conduct consistent with the hope you cherish? Are the motives of that conduct pure? Are the thoughts, feelings, and desires of the soul, occupied with divine things? And above all, is the soul running the race of self-denial, wrestling against sin, and pressing towards the prize of perfect holiness? Is there in any degree a disposition in the heart to choose any enjoyment rather than Christ? Is there any disposition to be satisfied with any attainment already made? If so, rest not till every particle of ground on which a false confidence might be built is torn away. Dig down deep through all the rubbish of your own self-righteousness, and build on the rock of faith and hourly obedience. If your present character afford you no confidence, seek by penitence and prayer the forgiveness of sin and a good hope in Jesus Christ.

WHAT IS RELIGION?—Notwithstanding so much is said on this subject, and notwithstanding the pretended knowledge of many respecting it, there are but few subjects on which there is profounder ignorance. It is one of those subjects that needs to be felt to be known, and unless felt, never is known. The most effective preaching,—that under which souls are converted, is the simple story of the cross. Seldom do persons impute their conviction to labored argument; that which finally arrests their attention, and is sealed to their conversion, is some plain Scripture truth, and which they thought they understood, seemed like a new idea. Till taught by the spirit, they were ignorant of its real meaning. Let the question,—what is religion, be proposed, and many individuals will find it difficult to render an answer satisfactory to themselves or others. The very term involves an idea to which the unconverted heart is a stranger. It implies a heartfelt reliance on Christ alone for salvation. Thus it strikes at the root of self-righteousness. The self-righteous person is independent of Christ, and consequently cannot be called religious, he has no reliance, for he needs none,—he is independent. How, then, can that system be called a religious system, which does not include Christ as an essential element, and which makes man independent of any being, as a mediator between him and his God. In this view, some systems that claim to be religious, as they do not make reliance or dependence necessary, must be reckoned as irreligious, or independent systems. Of this kind we apprehend, is the transcendentalism of New England, which, in asserting that *Christ*ianity could have existed without Christ, has made a ludicrous mistake both in the substance and the name.—Cross & Journal.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN A CLERGYMAN AND A FEMALE PARISHIONER.—Parishioner. It amazes me ministers don't write better sermons. I'm sick of their dull, prosy affairs.

Parson. But it is no easy matter, my good woman, to write good sermons.

Parishioner. Yes, but then you are so long about it. I could write one myself in half the time, if I had only the text.

Parson. O, if a text is what you want, I will furnish that. Take this one from Solomon. It is better to dwell on the house top, than in a broad house with a brawling woman.

Parishioner. Do you mean me, sir?

Parson. O, my good woman, you will never make a good sermonizer; you are too soon in your application.—North American.

QUESTIONS FOR CHILDREN.

If the poetic merit of the following does not commend it to notice, the purity and simplicity of the sentiment will secure for it the ready attention of very young children. Long before children are able to read, they may receive much valuable instruction through the medium of such a form of questions and answers; and in infant schools it will be very pleasant to have the couplets repeated in concert.

Question. My dear child, can you tell me who made you?

Answer. 'Twas God who bids the thunder roll,
That made my body and my soul.
Q. What is your soul?
A. That which is thinking in my heart.
Q. What will happen to your body when you die?
A. This flesh, these limbs will all decay.
And into dust will fade away.
Q. And will your soul die when your body dies?
A. No, it will go with God to dwell.
Or live in endless pain in hell.
Q. What is God?
A. God is a spirit and can see,
If I do wrong, where'er I be.
Q. What does God do for you?
A. He keeps from harm, he gives me food,
And every day he does me good.
Q. Which is God's book?
A. The Holy Bible is his word,
Which tells us how to serve the Lord.
Q. What does the Bible tell you to do?
A. With all my heart to love him still,
And always strive to do his will.
Q. Why ought you to love and serve God?
A. Because so very good is He,
And he is very kind to me.
Q. Have you, my child, thus served God?
A. Ah, no! I grieve him every day.
By what I do, and think, and say.
Q. Should you not be greatly concerned for having sinned against God?
A. I should indeed, because his law,
Speaks wrath to me for every flaw.
Q. Is there any way of being saved from punishment?
A. Yes; down from heaven the Savior came,
And bore for us a death of shame.
Q. Who is Jesus Christ?
A. He is the Almighty Son of God,
Although he took our flesh and blood.
Q. What kind of life did Jesus live?
A. He lived a holy life, and did,
Exactly what the scriptures bid.
Q. What did Christ suffer to save men?
A. Nailed to a cross, with angush sore,
The punishment of sin he bore.
Q. Was it not strange that Christ should die for such as you?
A. Indeed, it was amazing love,
It ought the hardest heart to move.
Q. How can you be benefitted by Christ's death?
A. By faith I must to Jesus cleave,
And sinful thoughts and courses leave.
Q. Can you, of yourself, bring your heart to love Christ and hate sin?
A. Alas! so hard my heart has been,
It won't love Christ, nor grieve for sin.
Q. How, then, shall your heart be made to love Christ and hate sin?
A. God, by his spirit, can impart
A loving, broken, holy heart.
Q. How should you pray, so as to obtain this great blessing?
A. Thro' Jesus Christ, this gift of heaven,
To all who truly ask is given.
Q. Where is Jesus Christ now?
A. In heaven he fills a glorious seat,
And angels bow beneath his feet.
Q. Will Christ ever come again?
A. The judgment day will soon appear,
And all shall see the Savior there;
The good shall go with God to dwell,
But wicked souls shall sink to hell.

TEACHING THE UNDERSTANDING.

Some teachers instruct the memory only. This may be of use to them at a future day, though it is very little present benefit. It should be the teacher's object to reach the heart, and while that is warmed with interest, stamp the truth upon it.

A writer in the Sunday School Journal, gives the following sketch of a conversation she had with a class of girls, which is a very good specimen of teaching the understanding:

In proposing to my class this question, How the disciples were to understand the Savior when he said, This is my body? (in allusion to the bread used at the last supper,) one of them answered, "they were to have faith, and believe that as bread nourished their bodies, so Christ's death was to save their souls."

"But what," asked I, "do you mean by their having faith?"

One answered, "it is belief in God."—Another that "it cannot be faith unless we love God, and keep his commandments." Another, that "it is the substance of things hoped for," &c.

"And what is the meaning of that?" They were at a loss, and could not answer. "Can you tell me what is the meaning of substance?" After some silence, one said, "she thought she understood it, but did not know how to explain herself."

"Try if you can give me some illustration." She answered, "if I were to take some flour, and mix it with water, would not that make a substance called paste?" "Well, then," said I, "the flour was not a substance until it was mixed with the water; was it?" "O yes!" said she, "it was; so is every thing we can taste or handle."

You see the book in my hand casts a shadow on the wall, is not that another kind of substance? "No!" she replied, "that is not a substance at all, that is only a shadow; but the book is a substance."

Well, what is the meaning of hoped for? "Wished for, and expected because it has been promised."

What is the meaning of evidence?

"It is a testimony!" "Suppose," said one of them, "one of this class should be accused before you for breaking the Sabbath, and she should deny it, and one of us should come up and say it is so, for I saw her do it, would not that be evidence?"

But do you think that was the evidence the Apostle meant? You gave evidence of what you had seen, but he speaks of the evidence of things not seen.

"Then," said she, "I suppose, he must have meant, that we must believe in God so much, that we shall be as sure of what he has promised us, as though we had it already."

"Miss———," said one, addressing me, "when you promised a Bible to the one who should be most punctual in her attendance at school, last year, I believed as firmly that I should get that book, if I tried, as if I had it already. Was not that faith?"

"But suppose I should have died," said I, "what then?"

"We thought, as you had promised, you would do it some how or other, so that in case you should die, we should get it from some one else."

Teachers who would succeed in this plan, must exercise much patience, and use all their skill in presenting apt illustrations. I will give an example, as a supplement to the above conversation:

Teacher. How is faith the substance of things hoped for?

Scholar. I do not know. Will you explain it?

T. A little boy once had a lamb, which he took care of, and called his own. His father sheared it in the summer, and found the wool worth a dollar. "You have no use for this money now," said he to his son, "I will keep it till you have some good use for it, and then I will give it to you." The boy was perfectly satisfied, and went and told his sister he had a dollar.

"Let me see it," said she. "I have not seen it yet myself," said he; "it is in father's pocket-book."

"How do you know it is there, if you never saw it?" she replied.

"Because father said he would let me have it, whenever I had a good use for it," said the boy.

Now you see the dollar was substance to the boy, as much as if the hard silver had been in his hand. How was that?

S. He had confidence in his father.

T. You are right; that dollar was a thing hoped for, although he spoke of it so confidently, but his faith in his father made it substance to him.

S. How is faith the evidence of things not seen?

T. Evidence gives us a knowledge of things we should know nothing about without evidence. A judge condemns a man to death because the evidence convinces him that he committed the crime charged against him, though he did not see him do it. Just so our faith in God's word affords us sure evidence that all the things he has promised are realities, though we have seen none of them.

Now tell me if it would not be very wrong for the child to tell his father that he dared not trust him to keep his money?

S. I think it would be insulting his father.

T. If his sister should tell him he had no evidence that he had a dollar in his father's hands, what should you think of her?

S. I should think she had a poor opinion of her father's word.

T. You now see why unbelief is so hateful to God, and why we cannot be saved without faith. Unbelief treats God as a liar not fit to be trusted. Faith honors Him, by trusting all he says.

Here the teacher should address the conscience of each scholar, to know if they do not feel that they are slighting God's word, and the guilt of so doing should be set home till they feel it in their inmost souls.

PRETTY GOOD.—A gentleman who was accustomed to borrow a newspaper, and who by the way is a great news-monger observed to his wife one morning after having attentively perused a morning paper (the Bulletin we suppose) he had borrowed of his neighbor.

"What a relish for breakfast, the perusal of a morning paper gives a body. In fact, I'd rather go without my breakfast than be deprived of a perusal of a good newspaper."

"Yes," said the intelligent lady, "if I was a man I would sooner starve than borrow a paper every morning."

The cut was so severe and effective that the husband straightway repaired to our office and subscribed to the Bulletin. Who wouldn't have the right kind of a wife?—Bulletin.

Dr. Mounsey, by way of ridiculing family pride, used to confess, that the first of his ancestors, of any note, was a baker and dealer in hops, a trade which enabled him with some difficulty to support his family. To procure a present sum, this ancestor had robbed his feather beds of their contents and supplied the deficency with unsaleable hops. In a few years a severe blight universally prevailing, hops became more scarce, and of course enormously dear; the hoarded treasure was ripped out, and a good sum procured for hops which, in a plentiful season were of no value; "and thus," the doctor used to add, "our family hopped from obscurity."

Many choose their friends for the sake of their full purses, rather than full hearts; and value them only for their exalted stations. They forgot that a full purse may soon be exhausted by frequent demands on it; while the more a full heart gives of its treasures the oftener it is replenished. We shall find the strings of the heart, and the strings of the purse, both tightened in the hour of adversity; the former around us—the latter around itself.

The Bishop of St. Asaph said, that "after the battle of Lafeldt, the officers seriously grumbled that no general was killed."

Sabbath—March 5. After the services in the Sanctuary, repaired to the water to attend to the ordinance of baptism, and were favored with baptising one (with others) who had been an exceeding wild and wicked youth, but now we believe hath, like Mary, "chosen that good part which shall not be taken from her." Another exhibition of the saving power in grace.

6. Preached our last discourse to the friends in Clark co., and on the 8th left for Pickaway.

9. Passed through Columbus, and at evening, fell in company with one who had formerly known what it was to take sweet counsel with the saints, and with them to walk to the house of God; but for about five years had been deprived of these privileges, or even listening to the instructions of any of our ministers. This we learned was the condition of all our friends residing in Pickaway.

10. Found ourselves in uncomfortable circumstances, as the rain had fallen in such torrents that the rivers and smaller streams had overflowed their banks, and the most of the bottoms were inundated. It appeared almost impossible to proceed far in any direction. We however, with much difficulty swam our horse across the river, took the carriage across in a skiff, and at even were in another field of labor. We have learned how to sympathise with those who have labored in this country as missionaries; yet we do not regret our engagement, but rejoice and hail it as a privilege. If any should think we exaggerate upon our embarrassments, let them take a tour through this country, at this season of the year, and they may be constrained to say like one of old, "the one-half had never been told them." In this place we found a number of families who were like sheep without a shepherd. Some still maintained the cause of Christ, and had endeavored to brave the storm, and to bear the burden in the heat of the day. Others had neglected to pay their vows, and consequently had grown cold in religion. Some few had wholly abandoned the cause of their Savior; also a goodly number who had settled with them from the east never did profess religion. Take them as a body, they were (religiously,) in a distracted condition. If I ever felt like laying low at the feet of Jesus, it was on learning the condition of these people. And notwithstanding the embarrassments through which I started and had prosecuted the journey thus far, I was happy to be there. The young had established the dance for sensual recreation, and had carried it to intoxication.—And because iniquity did abound, the love of many had waxed cold. These young people had been led on in their sports to such a degree, that one lover of Jesus said, "the wicked one saw his time to be short, and was doing his best."

12. Sabbath; many come out this day to hear the stranger. Some of the original settlers acted as though they thought one of the seven wonders of the world had developed itself; and they would gaze upon a Seventh-day Baptist preacher as though he had been some awful progeny in nature, or at least some supernatural production, and would express themselves thus: "I'll go and hear what he says about Saturday for Sunday." Strange that an advocate of one of the most prominent doctrines of the bible, and a doctrine, too, located in the very heart of the decalogue, should cause such a wonder in this enlightened christian land. Many listened as though they were anxious to hear effectually the glad news of salvation, and at the close, the majority pledged themselves to seek and serve the Lord.—Meetings were then kept up with deep interest, and many souls were hopefully converted.

20. After services repaired to the Sciota river, a distance of about two miles, and baptized ten happy converts. Another week was spent in the same manner, and the meetings were carried on with increasing interest. Evening meetings were so crowded that many, very many, could only cluster around the doors and windows. Often after the meetings were closed, though kept to a late hour, it was with difficulty that we could get the congregation to disperse.

26. Sabbath; house and yard was crowded with people, and we were again privileged with going to the river, and there leading five converts down into the liquid grave.

27. A larger congregation still. The good spirit fell like rain upon the people, and five more followed their Savior in the pleasing ordinance of baptism.

28. Constituted a church of nine original members, and received ten candidates into the church. The church then elected Charles Clark for their Deacon, and Alonzo Graham, church clerk; after which we partook of the Lord's Supper. Many more will doubtless join soon. With regard to their location; they are in a rich, fertile country, and as healthy as any we have seen in the State of Ohio, and but eighteen miles south of Columbus, and two miles west of South Bloomfield, the Sciota river and canal. There is now about thirteen hundred acres of wild land in the immediate vicinity, which can be purchased at from four to six dollars per acre. Their Post-office address is South Bloomfield, Pickaway co., O.—Here is a field of labor for some young man or for any one of God's ministers, and the brightest prospects we have seen for usefulness. The harvest is ripe. Who will go to them? They are praying the Lord of the harvest to send them a laborer. Who will reject God's holy spirit, and refuse the call? Shall these souls perish for the want of the bread of eternal life, while there may be enough to go, if they would only consent to suffer a few privations for Christ's sake? Our Savior was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor enough to say, "the foxes have holes, and the fowls of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." Mark his example, ye soldiers of the cross. He traveled on foot, by land and on the water, passaged in a fisherman's boat.

* * * * * *

We need, at least, twenty faithful ministers in this western country who should devote all of their time to the gospel ministry. Can we not send them? But to proceed.

29. Gave the friends in Sciota, a farewell address.

30. Left for Warren co.

31. Called at Br. Sweeney's in Butlerville.

Sabbath and first day preached at father Hill's. We found these friends also destitute of the preached gospel; but they are endeavoring to lay up for themselves a treasure in heaven.

4. Started for Ripley co., Ia. Passed through Cincinnati.

5. The city was thronged with people, it being a convention day of the Washingtonian Temperance Society. Several steamers played up and down the river, carrying passengers at free cost. The convention was delegated from all the main parts on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, from Pittsburg to New Orleans, and from the cities and main towns in the interior of the adjacent States. Entertainment was free for all for the space of three days. Each family in the city offering entertainment, hung white tape upon their door posts, and but now and then a lowly cottage was without its sign. It was estimated that thirty thousand children, from the different portions of the country, under fourteen years of age, formed a procession, and with their banners, marched through the city. Also five thousand females—members of the Martha Washingtonian Society—formed on the north of the Park. We only add, Temperance is doing wonders in this country.

April 6. We are now in Ripley co.—Here are many eastern families, whose religious circumstances belong to a future communication. However, we anticipate but a short stay with these people.

Yours, &c. J. L. SCOTT.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New-York Evangelist.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

TWENTY-EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Great Western arrived at N. York on the 17th instant, at 12 o'clock, and has brought intelligence down to the 2nd inst., some of which is of very great importance.

The most important news is the recent disastrous defeat of the British army in India. The London papers are filled with the melancholy intelligence. Affghanistan, which was captured some two or three years since, after an immense slaughter of the natives, and incredible bravery and expense on the part of the British, has been retaken, and six thousand of the British troops cut to pieces. It is said that Sir William McNaughton, the British Envoy at Cabul, was treacherously assassinated; and his head was cut off, a portion of his mutilated body thrust into the mouth, and decorated with the green spectacles he used to wear, was paraded through the streets, by order of the son of Dost Mohammed, the deposed chief of the tribe, who is now in the keeping of the British as a hostage.

The ladies attached to the Envoy had been seized, and kept as hostages by the Affghans.

Gen. Elphinstone, aged 60, who distinguished himself at Waterloo, Lieut. Burns, and other distinguished officers, were among the slain. The British Government had ordered out large reinforcements. In reply to inquiry in the House of Commons on the 11th of March, Sir Robert Peel said:

"It was impossible to deny that our troops had met with a very serious reverse, and by an act of great perfidy and treachery, had neen attacked on their way from Cabul, after its capitulation. Still there was no cause for despair, and government would take immediate steps to remedy this partial disaster; and he had no doubt but that Parliament would give its support to whatever might be proposed to maintain our Indian empire."

Sir Robert Peel had formally proposed his financial policy. He shows a deficency of £10,000,000 in the revenue since 1837; and he proposes to meet this and support two large and expensive wars in India, and one in China, by levying a new property tax—such as has hitherto been resorted to for temporary periods, to meet the urgent exigencies of war. The rate proposed is 7d. on the pound, or £2 18 4 per cent. upon all the property and income of the country, excepting such incomes as do not reach £150 a year.

He also proposes a general revision of the Tariff laws and modes of taxation, better adapted to the present state of things—diminishing some, increasing others—but upon the whole, raising the whole so as to cover all the necessary expenses of the Government. All funded property, whether belonging to foreigners or natives, to be subject to the same duty. There is to be no property tax in Ireland, only a tax on spirits.

The whole of the new taxes which were to go into operation on the 5th of April, 1842, were as follows:

From the income tax,	£3,770,000
" the Irish stamp duty,	160,000
" the Irish spirit duty,	250,000
" the duty on British coal,	200,000
	£4,380,000

Leaving a surplus of £1,800,000 after covering the deficit.

Lord Brougham has taken strong ground against the financial policy proposed by Sir Robert Peel. Trade continues very much depressed. The cotton market is dull, and the distress which has so long prevailed among the laboring classes, is not at all slackened in severity.

In the course of the discussions, Sir Robert informed the House that the Queen had of her own accord given him to understand, that if Parliament should think an income tax necessary, it was her wish and intention that her income should be subjected to it, as well as those of her people.

Sir Robert's project met with great opposition, both in Parliament and out of doors. In the upper house Lord Brougham introduced a sort of manifesto against the income tax, in a series of resolutions, but the Lords could not be moved even to speak upon them. Sir Robert has expressly staked the existence of his government upon the fate of this bill. If it does not succeed, he proposes to resign. The probabilities of its success are none of the most flattering.

Sir Robert stated that the Temperance movement in Ireland had ceased or retrograded, as the consumption of spirits had constantly increased since July, 1841, to the present time. But others who must know the state of things much better than the premier, tell a different story.

The following note in reference to this intelligence, has been published in the Journal of Commerce, by Rev. Mr. Marsh of this city, which puts another aspect upon the noble Irish reform:

"I perceive by your Journal of yesterday, that Sir Robert Peel states that the Temperance pledge has failed of its work in Ireland, in proof of which it is mentioned there has been an increased consumption of spirits there since July, 1841. We are not disposed to doubt the correctness of his Lordship's statement—but the uniform accounts which we receive from gentlemen in whom we have confidence, are, that in general, the Irish adhere well to their pledge, and that Father Mathew is constantly gaining new triumphs; so that, if Sir Robert's statement is true, concerning the consumption of spirits, it may perhaps be accounted for in some other way than as proving a failure of the Temperance principle. Permit me to send you a letter just received from Richard Allen, Corresponding Secretary of the Irish Temperance Union.

Dublin, March 1st, 1842.

REV. J. MARSH:—Although I have but a moment to write, I think I ought to say that the cause of total abstinence progresses nobly here. Our jails, our saving's banks, our Mechanic's Institutes, all tell of the improved habits of our people. The indefatigable Father Mathew goes on as untiringly as ever. The Dublin Monthly Magazine for last month, contains abundance of statistical details, showing what Temperance has done for us—viz: a deposite in the Dublin Savings' Banks of upwards of £32,000 at the end of 1841 over 1840, and 1178 more depositors; a great decrease of prisoners in Bridewell; judges charges declaring the diminution of crime also the Reports of the Waterford Temperance Society, embodying delightful results one of which is, that there is £100,000 worth more of furniture in the cabins and habitations about and in Waterford, than there was two years ago.

Neither here, nor in Father Mathew's speeches, nor any of the speeches made a weekly temperance meetings, is there an intimation that the pledge is not accomplishing its legitimate work."

The results of the West India emancipation are regarded by the Government with very great satisfaction and gratulation.—Lord Stanley alluded to the moral and social improvement in Jamaica and Demerara the two largest colonies. The negroes were saving money and buying land. This led, as they became independent, to a scarcity of laborers for the planters. Wages became so high as to be absolutely ruinous. The remedies were, improvements in management and cultivation, and an extensive immigration of free labor.

The Right of Search.

The Times of the 30th ult. contains Lord Aberdeen's reply to Mr. Stevenson's note on the right of search, and in its remarks upon this state paper, says, "Lord Aberdeen begins by disclaiming all responsibility for any expressions used by his predecessor, Lord Palmerston—he then explicitly repeats his former renunciations, on the part of this country, of all claim to a right of search over American vessels in time of peace; and observes, that when a vessel is once ascertained to be American, the British cruisers are ordered to abstain from all interference with her, be she slaver or otherwise.

With American vessels, whatever be their destination, British cruisers have no pretension in any manner to interfere. Such vessels must be permitted, if engaged in it, to enjoy a monopoly of this unhallowed trade, but the British Government, continues Lord Aberdeen, will never endure that the fraudulent use of the American flag shall extend the iniquity to other nations, by whom it is abhorred, and who have entered into solemn treaties with this country for its entire suppression."

The news of the seizure of Hogan had not created much sensation. So too, the proceedings which have been had in this country, to promote the repeal of the Union between England and Ireland, have excited no alarm.

The bill to legalize mixed marriages in Ireland, after its passage in the Commons, was laid aside in the upper house to await the return of the Judges from circuit. A case involving the legal question, was likely to come before the House as a Court of Appeal.

The Earl of Munster, the eldest of the late King, has committed suicide. He had shot himself on the night of the 20th ult., at his house in Belgrave Square. He was in his 48th year.

The Duke of Norfolk died on the 16th ult., in St. James' Square, London. Cherubini, the celebrated composer, died in Paris on 15th ult. He composed his own funeral requiem. Sir George Arthur, it is said, will be the new Governor of Bombay. Mr. O'Connell is preparing to defend his seat for Cork with zeal.

Greece.

Accounts from Athens state that warlike preparations were still making in Greece, and that all the disposable forces were being marched to the frontiers, along which the Turks were said to have already collected a force of 100,000 men. It was feared that actual hostilities would soon commence.

Portugal.

On the 16th of March the Queen gave birth to another Prince, which happy event was celebrated with the usual rejoicings.

American Missionaries Plundered, &c.

Very important despatches have been received from Syria. The Druses believing that the British Agent was conducting himself toward them with great treachery, stormed the English and American missions, plundered their contents, destroyed the establishments, burnt the books and manuscripts, and finally ejected the reverend gentlemen from the country. The particulars of this most disastrous calamity and vile outrage may be daily expected, as letters will no doubt be forwarded by the Indian overland mails now due.

[This account, as far as it respects the American missionaries, is to be received with distrust. Its correctness is not relied upon by the American Board. It will probably turn out that though the English missionaries may be driven off, the American have been protected.]

Congressional News.

IN SENATE.

The Loan Bill Passed.

April. 13.—The discussion of the Loan Bill was renewed to-day, and after a long sitting, the question was taken and the bill passed, 26 to 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Sprague, Talmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagy, Benton, Buchannan, Calhoun, Clayton, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith, of Conneticut, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, Wright, Young—18.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Minister to Mexico.

April 13.—A warm debate took place on a motion to strike out an appropriation for a Minister to Mexico. But the motion was finally negatived.

Loan Bill passed.

April 14.—A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had passed and returned to the House the Loan bill, with an amendment, to which the Senate asked the concurrence of the House.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

No further business of importance has been transacted; two days have been necessarily interrupted by the death and burial of Hon. Joseph Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, as noticed in another column of this paper.

News of the Day.

CHAPTER 157—An act to extend the exemption of household furniture and working tools from distress for rent, and sale under execution.

Passed April 11, 1842.

The People of the State of New-York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

§ 1. In addition to the articles now exempt by law from distress for rent, or levy and sale under execution, there shall be exempted from such distress, and levy and sale, necessary household furniture and working tools and team owned by any person being a householder, or having a family for which he provides, to the value of not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars; provided that such exemption shall not extend to any execution issued on a demand for the purchase money of such furniture, or tools, or team, or articles now enumerated by law.

§ 2. When a man having a family, shall die, leaving a widow or minor child or children, there shall be inventoried by the appraisers, and set apart for the use of such widow and child or children, or for the use of such child or children, in the manner now prescribed by the ninth section of title third, chapter, sixth, of part second of the Revised Statutes, necessary household furniture, provisions or other personal property, in the discretion of said appraisers, to the value of not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars, in addition to the articles of personal property now exempt from appraisal by said section.

§ 3. Every assignment, sale or pledge of articles which are now exempt by law from execution, and of property exempted by this act, and every levy or sale of such articles or property by virtue of an execution, by consent of the defendant therein, shall be void, where the consideration, or any part thereof, for which such assignment, sale or pledge was made, or for the debt on which judgment rendered in any court, and on which such execution was issued, was for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and in any action commenced for the recovery of the property sold as aforesaid, the person for whose benefit such sale or transfer was made, may be called and examined as a witness, as to the fact of the sale of intoxicating liquors, so made in the same manner, and subject to the same penalties, as if called in any other case.

§ 4. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of May next.

The Rochester Post states that a movement is in progress for inducing the forwarders on the Erie Canal to order that hereafter their men shall have the privilege of rest from labor on the Sabbath, and adds that a request to this effect, signed by about 100 business men of Rochester, has been presented to the forwarders of that city.

Gen. Wilson, of Iowa, in a late address, states that the price of shoeing a horse in Iowa is $5, and that it takes a wagon load of corn to pay for it. He says a man who knows how to hammer iron can make more money than a Member of Congress.

A sloop of war has been ordered by the United States Government, to Galveston, from Pensacola, for the protection of American citizens and property, in case of Mexican invasion.

It is estimated that in Great Britain the number of families employed in agriculture is 961,134; and in the United States the number of persons 3,717,756.

Official documents submitted to Congress, show that the average number of passengers between Albany and New-York, from May to December, is three thousand per day.

The U. S. revenue cutter Taney has arrived at Baltimore, with Eldridge Stockwell, of Lowell, Mass., sent home by the American Consul at Montevideo, for the murder of Wm. Knights, of Portland, Me., on board the ship Aurora, of Boston, at Montevideo, on the 15th of Nov.

The Postmaster General has issued instructions that newspaper postage is to be charged upon newspapers, extra newspapers, supplements to newspapers, and the printed or written notices sent by the publishers of newspapers to their subscribers, attached to the margin of the newspaper, stating the amount due for subscriptions.

Whiskey is selling at Cincinnati at ten cents and a half per gallon—and a dull market at that.

Encke's Comet will be nearest the earth on the 4th of May. It was first seen in this country, on the 28th of March, by Prof. Kendall, of Philadelphia. A few days subsequently it was seen at New Haven. It cannot be discerned without a telescope.—The nearest fixed star of any considerable brillancy is, at present, Omicron Arietis.

The Mayor and Aldermen in Boston have resolved to license no person to sell spirituous liquors the ensuing year. This is beginning at the right place. At Northampton, Mass., the Commissioners, at the request of a large number of innholders, have refused all licenses to sell intoxicating drinks. This brings them all up to the cold water standard.

Mr. Gillman, of Alexandria, D. C. has been arrested for setting a spring gun, which caused the death of a man who undertook to rob his poultry yard.

The Grand Jury of Pittsburgh, Pa. present drunkennes as a nuisance, and recommended that it be made an indictable offence.

VISITATION OF AMERICAN VESSELS.—We learn that Captain Conway, of the brig Mermaid, which arrived at this port, late from Rio Grande, was boarded twice on the Coast of Africa, from H. B. M. Brig Brisk. He was treated, on both occasions, with great civility by the boarding officer, and no attempt was made to search his vessel. The officer would not even enter the cabin, without a particular invitation. Captain Conway was informed by British officers at St. Helena, that their government had given precise orders to abstain from proceedings of an offensive nature, such as the removal of hatches, and similar proceedings, which have been complained of heretofore. Even in the British colony of St. Helena, public opinion was strongly expressed against the former seizure of the bark Jones, of this port.—Salem Gazette.

The Boundary Question.—In allusion to the report respecting the adjustment of the Boundary Question, through the medium of Lord Ashburton, and the convening of the legislature of Maine, the Portland Argus contains the following:

"It is now pretty generally understood in this quarter, that Mr. Webster has written to Governor Fairfield, requesting him to call, forthwith, an extra session of the legislature, for the purpose of appointing commissioners to treat with Lord Ashburton, and the General Government, on the North-eastern Boundary Question. It is also understood that Governor Davis, of Mass., has been written to on the same subject, and for the same purpose. If the legislature of this state should be convened for the single object of taking preliminary steps in the settlement of this perplexing question, we hope that party considerations will not be allowed, in the remotest degree, to mingle in its deliberations.

OPENING OF THE CANALS.—Yesterday, 20th inst., the water was let into the canal throughout its entire line, agreeably to the previously published order of the canal board.

At sundown forty-five boats had been cleared at the Collector's office in this city, and no doubt the number ran up to fifty during the evening. The lines of tow-boats came up from New-York on Monday with full freights; and the boats cleared on the canal, although not as heavily freighted as at the opening last year, were nevertheless generally well filled, and indicate quite as active business as had been anticipated.

In all this section the enlarged canal is in use. It has been brought to this state of completion, by the incredible efforts of the present contractors. Two boats, with flags and music, and with a numerous company, the invited guests of the engineers and contractors, giving and receiving salutes along the way, came down from the lower aqueduct yesterday, reaching the basin at about five in the afternoon. Throughout all these levels therefore—among the most important and difficult of the entire route—the canal has been brought promptly into working order.—Albany Argus.

Accident to the Marquis of Waterford.—His Intended Marriage—The most reckless man of the day, of course we mean the Marquis of Waterford, has just had rather a bad accident. In an annual steeple chase near Dublin, a short time since, he fell from his favorite mare Columbine, and, the beast rolled over him. He was picked up in a swoon. He is about to marry the Honorable Miss Louisa Stuart, the daughter of Lord de Rothsay, only awaiting the consent of the father, which has to be sent from St. Petersburg.

Indemnification.—We learn from the official journal, the Madisonian, that information has been received at the Department of State, that the Belgian Chambers of Deputies has passed a law authorizing the payment of eight millions of francs for losses caused by the late Belgian Revolution. These losses include, of course, the merchandise belonging to American merchants, destroyed in the citadel at Antwerp.

The British Government also have acceded to the justice of the claim preferred by the United States Government on behalf of the owners of the brig Tigris, for the capture and detention of that vessel on the cost of Africa.

Death of General J. R. Fenwick.—A letter from General Cass, our Minister at Paris, announces to the department of state, that General Fenwick died at Marseilles, of apoplexy, on the 19th of March.

Rhode Island.—The Providence Express of Wednesday, says:—

"We are happy to announce to distant readers, that notwithstanding the menaces of the landholders, and the threatened interference of the civil and military authorities, the people were not molested in the discharge of their duty, and nothing occurred to disturb the public tranquility."

A GOOD TITLE.—At an ejectment cause tried at the Onondaga Circuit, the defendant claimed title under a patent signed George Washington, Commander-in-Chief, &c. &c. The signature was proved by two or three old soldiers from Orange county.

The debts of Samuel Fox Stephens, a London bill-broker, are stated to be between £300,000 and £400,000, while the assets are not likely to realise as many shillings.

A Liverpool paper states that there is now in that town, an American lady, who has crossed the Atlantic fifty-five times.

Several shocks of an earthquake have recently been felt at Falmouth and other places in the south of England, much to the terror of the more superstitious portion of the inhabitants.

As many as two thousand five hundred persons have landed from steamboats at St. Louis, Mo. in a single day.

Important Decision.—In February last, twenty-two of the crew of the British ship Ann Hall, were committed to prison in Charleston, S. C., at the Instance of the British Consul on a charge of Mutiny on the high seas, they having seized and confined the master with handcuffs and a strait jacket, on the ground of his being intoxicated or insane. On the clearance of the Ann Hall, for Liverpool, on the 18th ult., the master made an oath that he considered his life in danger if he should attempt to carry home, whether at large or under restraint, ten of the crew, who were therefore left behind in jail, the British Consul intending to keep them in prison to await instructions from the British Secretary of State, as to the steps to be taken to bring them to trial. Last week these seamen were brought before J. Axson, Recorder of Charleston, on habeas corpus to obtain their discharge, which the Recorder has very properly granted, on the ground that in the absence of any treaty stipulation to that effect between this country and Great Britain there was no authority to arrest or detain them as fugitives from justice. What say our enlightened praters about this "comity of nations" in delivering up "mutineers and murderers" now? or does the color of a man's skin make the difference?—N. Y. Amer.

Awful Steamboat Explosion—Fearful destruction of Lives.—The steamer Medora, plying between Norfolk and Baltimore on the Chesapeake, burst her boiler on the 15th inst., and occasioned a fearful destruction of human life. The boat had just been completed, and had set out on a pleasure trip. The day being pleasant, over one hundred passengers were on board. Just as she started, her boiler exploded, carrying upward a considerable portion of the upper deck and those upon it, blowing the chimneys high in the air.

The boat was instantly enveloped in a cloud of scalding steam. Several jumped overboard. In the centre and forward part of the boat, there was a fearful destruction of life and limb. Some were blown high in the air, and fell on shore, and in the water. Others were crushed with the splintered timbers; others scalded with steam; while those below the decks not having time to escape, were either suffocated by steam, or drowned. A large portion of those on board were more or less scalded and injured.

Mr. Cooper and his Libel Suits.—The Otsego County Court, which adjourned on Thursday, was occupied, during most of the term, with the trial of slander and libel suits, in which Mr. J. Fenimore Cooper appeared as defendant in one cause, and as plaintiff in three. Judge Gridley presided. In the first case, one of Mr. Cooper's neighbors sued him for accusing plaintiff of stealing apples. The jury could not make up their minds from the testimony whether the charge was true or not—and consequently could not agree upon any verdict. In the seccond case, Cooper vs. Northway, for publishing a libel in the Oneida Whig, the jury awarded Mr. Cooper $70 damages. The other two cases were against Thurlow Weed and Hoffman & White, publishers of the Albany Eventng Journal; in one the Jury gave Mr. Cooper $55 damages, and in the other $212.

Rhode Island.—The election appointed by the new Free Suffrage Constitution, occurred on Monday last. The decided ground taken by the President in relation to the resolution, had cooled the ardour of the faction very sensibly. According to all accounts the election was carried on very peaceably, and all the apprehensions of riot and bloodshed which had been excited, proved groundless. It will soon take its place in the public estimation as a perfect farce.

Exemption of Household Furniture.—One of the good things done by the Legislature before its adjournment was the passage of the law exempting household furniture to the value of $150 from seizure under executions or landlords' warrants. This humane measure will save the unfortunate poor a great deal of cruelty and distress inflicted by such remorseless landlords or unfeeling creditors as were willing to strip them of the bare necessaries of life to satisfy a small debt, of a few shillings of rent. —Sun.

Honesty.—Our advertising column has shown for several days the loss of a large sum of money by Messrs. Clarke & Saxton. The money was found in Wall street, opposite the Merchants' Bank, by a very poor boy named Geo. Herbert, of 58 Ridge street, a seller of penny papers. Being unable to read, he took the money and check to his uncle, an equally poor day laborer, destitute of even the necessaries of life, and who had been out of employ for six weeks. With an integrity that does honor to our nature, the money and check were returned unchanged. The uncle's name is Joseph Hughes.—Com. Adv.

The Treasury of the State of Virginia is empty. The Richmond Whig says, "we hear that two drafts of our Treasurer were protested this week—one for $4 and another for $5,000. Reason—no funds."

Right of Petition.—The Legislature of of Maine at its late session, by a vote in the Senate of 16 to 11, and the House 74 to 44, declared that the gag rule is an infringement of the right of petition secured to the people by the Constitution, and ought to be abolished; and that they forbore to instruct their reprsentatives to vote for its repeal, as their oaths were sufficient to bind them to do so.

United States Loan.—It gives us pleasure to be able to state that an offer has been made to the government, at par, and on otherwise favorable terms, for a considerable part of the United States Loan lately authorised by an act of Congress.—National Intelligencer.

Death of Another Member of Congress.—Mr Joseph Lawrence, of Washington Co., Pa., died at Washington on Sunday, aged 54 years. He had been ill a fortnight, having been taken on his return from long watching in the chamber of sickness at home, where he had lost a son and daughter. Mr. L. was a devout Christian. He was 4 years Speaker of the State Legislature, and had been 5 years a member of Congress—in both places an honored and useful servant. In politics he was Whig. This death is the 4th of this Congress.

The Maine Boundary.—A gentleman who has just arrived from the State of Maine, reports that Gov. Fairfield was about to convene the Legislature of that State, in consequence of despatches just received by him from Mr. Webster, stating that Lord Ashburton was fully authorised to settle the Boundary Question, and that there was every prospect that this long disputed matter would be soon adjusted to the satisfaction of all parties.—Boston Times.

Riot in College.—Bowdoin College has been disgraced by a riot of the students, who on the evening of the annual Fast Day, smashed the college windows, dislodged and threw from the belfry the college bell, and brutally assaulted Professor Goodwin, who, in endeavoring to identify the ringleaders, received a strong solution of nitric acid in his face, which it is feared, will deprive him of his eye-sight. The miscreant who discharged it at him was partially identified, however, and will receive the punishment due to his crime. Four of the ringleaders have been arrested and committed for examination.

The Great Indian Council.—The Louisville Journal of the 13th instant says,—John Ross and two other Cherokee chiefs, together with Ross's son and daughter, passed through this city, yesterday, on their way to Washington. This is a sufficient refutation of the story that a Great Indian Council was to be held in the West, in the month of April, with a view to concert hostile measures against the United States; and that John Ross, Principle Chief of the Cherokee Nation, was at the head of the movement.

Blockade of the Mexican Ports.—The New Orleans Courier states, on the authority of a letter written in Tampico a week ago, that Santa Anna had purchased two steamers in England, manned and armed for fight, in addition to the City of Dublin steamer, lying at Vera Cruz. Two corvetts are also about to pass under the Mexican flag. So that it is posible Santa Anna's vessels may outnumber Houston's—and being managed by Englishmen, will probably show some fight for supremacy in the Gulf.

Within a few days there arrived at Fairmount Locks, Philadelphia, one thousand and ninety forty-two pound cannon balls, weighing together 102,906 pounds.

Mrs. Madison.—This distinguished lady, the widow of James Madison, has arrived in this city, accompanied by two of her neices, and taken lodgings at the Astor House.

It was about thirty years ago this lady was last in our city. A whole generation has grown up sinee, and New-York must have the air and look of altogether another city.—N. Y. Express.

The seal fishery of Newfoundland, it was expected, would terminate unfavorably, the weather having been much against it.

The Tennessee legislature, at its late session, passed a law, authorizing the Gov. in all cases to commute the punishment of death for that of imprisonment for life—which is spoken of as virtually the abolition of capital punishment.

G. W. Junkin, D. D. formerly President of La Fayette College at Easton, Pa. but for several years President of Miami University, (Ohio) died suddenly on the 5th inst.

There is a castor oil factory at St. Louis, which employs thirty-five hands. It has sold 800 barrels at an average of $50 per barrel, having consumed 18,500 bushels of beans, at a cost of from $1 to $1.25 per bushel.

A recent decision of the Supreme Court establishes the doctrine that smuggled goods are subject to seizure after being transferred. The oath simply of the importing agent will not swear them through.

Holmes is on trial at Philadelphia for manslaughter—for having thrown overboard the persons who escaped with him in a boat from the William Brown, the details of which have been published. Some of the witnesses testify that it was done in a heartless, cruel manner, and others to the reverse.

Late accounts from Havana represent the statements that have appeared relative to the difficulties with the mails by the British steamers, to have been greatly exaggerated. The chief point involved is the opening of the British seal, which the mail agents contend should be opened by the British Consul, while the Governor contends that it should be opened by the Spanish Post Office authorities.

The Creek Indians number more than 20,000 souls—The country in which they reside is not surpassed by any in the U. S. Some of those Indians are large slaveholders, grow immense quantities of corn, and raise large herds of cattle.

Important Invention.—We have been shown a newly invented gun carriage, the invention of Henry Chickeston, an ordinary seaman, on board of the North Carolina. The invention consists of an apparatus, by which a gun can be pointed in an oblique direction, without moving the carriage, and with the utmost ease—a forty-two pounder only requiring a man on each side. It is highly spoken of by many of our military and naval gentlemen, and we trust the government will bestow some attention upon the invention and the inventor.

Receipts on the Western Railroad, Mass., for one week, ending April 9th, 1842, for passengers $3,804.31; freight and mail $3,703.64—total $7,597.95.

Deficiencies have been discovered in the accounts of Joseph Plankinton, Treasurer of Philadelphia co. It is said his defalcations amount to some $70,000 or $80,000.

The Haverhill Gazette says that the Disunion petition is a literal copy of one of those sent from the South during the days of Nullification.

A little daughter of Reuben Hays, of Greenwich, was so severely scalded by the upsetting of a tea-kettle of boiling water, a few days since, as to cause her death.

A large amount of Canadian capital is deposited in the western States, for the purchase of wheat. At Chicago 35,000 bushels have been purchased with such capital. This wheat passing by the Welland canal is floured in Canada, and finds the English market.

Whipping, as a punishment, was abolished by the last legislature of New Jersey, in a supplement to the law for the punishment of crimes.

The city of Albany is indebted $437,33 43; her resources $276,862 34—not all available.

DIED,

In Preston, on the 10th of April, JENNET, wife of Paul C. Maxson, aged 40 years.

Sister Maxson having received a pious education while a child, early discovered the deceitfulness of the human heart, and the Vanity and uncertainty of all earthly things, placed her affections on things above, "where moths do not corrupt, or thieves break through and steal." She made a profession of religion whilst a youth and joined the first Seventh Day Baptist Church of Christ in this town and ever lived an ornament of her profession. In her death, her husband has lost a loving and tender bosom companion, her parents a dutiful and affectionate daughter, her sisters a loving friend, community a very useful and agreeable associate, and the church, a humble warm hearted, laborious and efficient member, whose place it will be difficult to fill, and whose memory will not soon be forgotten.

J. T.

In Brookfield, on the 18th inst. of organic affection of the heart, Mrs. CHARLOTTE, wife of De Witt C. Coon, and daughter of Nathan Burch, aged 30 years and 26 days. The deceased was a member of the Seventh Day Baptist church of Brookfield.—She embraced the religion of Jesus Christ in early life, and for more than 14 years, has been a worthy member of the church. In her life, she has been an example of piety, and in her death, has exhibited the power of the religion which she professed.—While in the most extreme pain, she would exclaim, "bless the Lord O my soul." While her friends were weeping around her dying bed, she repeated a part of the following verse:

When the pangs of death assail me,
Weep not for me;
Christ is mine, he cannot fail me,
Weep not for me;
Yes, though sin and death endeavor,
From his love my soul to draw,
Jesus is my strength forever,
Weep not for me.

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. Every stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25, those wishing to vote by proxy, can do so, by forwarding their votes to some one of the stockholders; naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting also their number of shares.

De Ruyter Lyceum.

The question of the last debate was decided in favor of the Negative.

Next Monday evening the following question will be discussed: Does the American Slave, deserve our sympathies more than the American Indian.

Disputants.—Affirmative, Newel Brainard. Negative, Henry Goodwin.

Suicide.—John F. Browning, a merchant-tailor of Philadelphia, recently committed suicide by cutting his throat with a dissecting-knife.

PRIMARY SCHOOL.

The Trustees of De Ruyter Institute would respectfully inform the public that they have engaged Miss Elizabeth B. Goodrich, as a Teacher in the Primary Department. Her long experience in teaching we trust will insure the confidence of all who may wish to patronize said school. The school will commence on Monday, the 25th inst., and continue until the close of the regular Summer Term, or 16 weeks.

☞Terms of Tuition will be one dollar & fifty cents.

Missionary Agent.

To the eastern churches and others who may be directly interested, Brother Sherman S. Griswold, an evangelist minister in this church, (Piscataway,) has been appointed a missionary and agent by the Executive Committee of the Missionary Society, to travel and preach the gospel and collect funds for the benefit of the Society, that the gospel may be sent to the destitute churches, and settlements where our brethren may be located. His journey and labors will be through New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Rensselaer county, &c., and as his mission is one of great moment, he hopes that as the time allotted him is short, that the people will be in readiness when he comes among them, to assist him in his noble enterprize—especially the ministers, that he may accomplish much in a short time, and that his efforts may bring a new era among us upon the subject of missions. And as Mr. Griswold is a stranger in the denomination, we would say, that we think him fully competent for the duty assigned him, and hope that he will receive that hearty reception with ministers and people where he may travel that his station and calling demands.

Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ,
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practisal school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

_ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES' INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.
CAPITAL,
ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!
Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.
CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,
COMBINING
FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE
SHARES $100 EACH.
10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estaate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon. exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

Commissioners:
Edward Rogers,
A. C. H. Smith,
Baron S. Doty,
Cornelius Masten,
Platt Adams,
M. Ogden,
E. G. Merrick,
Elias Goodspeed,
Calvin K. Averill,
Benjamin Balch.

Any communication relative to the business of this company, made in New York city, if addressed to BENJAMIN BALCH, will receive prompt attention. 50t1m

Agencies of this company will be appointed in such states as may wish to secure them; but only upon an interest being first taken in the stock.

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

A Psalm of Life.

On the rushing tide of life,
Ever full, yet ever shifting,
Blinded with the smoke of strife,
We like battle-ships are drifting.

While the startling thunders boom,
And wrecked barques go down forever,
In the far horizon loom
Hopes that urge to new endeavor.

Shadows o'er the surface quiver,
And we call them wealth and fame;
Gems of truth deep in the river
Flash like tongues of cloven flame.

Virtues are reflected stars
Which compel the heart to love them,
While no storm their brightness mars,
For their home is high above them.

Heaven gives glory to the water!
Lo! yon crimson clouds that seem
Like war-banners bathed in slaughter,
All are painted in the stream.

And, enshrined in coral caves,
Deeds of love on diamonds gleaming
In their deep, transparent graves,
Like sweet infants brightly dreaming.

Grief, a willow, stands and weeps
O'er the wave itself hath shaded
And its silent vigil keeps
When the light of day hath faded.

Memory, with her finger placed
On her lip, the past is reading,
In that magic mirror traced,
Far remote, and still receding.

A TALE OF WESTERN CHIVALRY.

"About the middle of July, 1782, seven Wyandotts crossed the Ohio a few miles above Wheeling, and committed great depredations upon the southern shore, killing an old man whom they fonnd alone in his cabin, and spreading terror throughout the neighborhood. Within a few hours after their retreat, eight men assembled from different parts of the small settlement and pursued the enemy with great expedition. Among the most active and efficient of the party, were two brothers, Andrew and Adam Poe. Andrew was particularly popular. In strength, action and hardihood, he had no equal—being finely formed and inured to all the perils of the woods.

They had not followed the trail far, before they became satisfied that the depredators were conducted by Big Foot, a renowned chief of the Wyandott tribe, who derived his name from the immense size of his foot. His height considerably exceeded six feet, and his strength was represented as Herculean. He had also five brothers, but little inferior to himself in size and courage, and as they generally went in company, they were the terror of the whole country. Andrew Poe was overjoyed at the idea of measuring his strength with that of so celebrated a chief, and urged the pursuit with a keenness which quickly brought him into the vicinity of the enemy. For the last few miles, the trail had led them up the southern bank of the Ohio, where the foot prints in the sand were deep and obvious, but when within a few hundred yards of the point at which the whites as well as the Indians were in the habit of crossing, it suddenly diverged from the stream, and streched along a rocky ridge, forming an obtuse angle with its former direction. Here Andrew halted for a moment, and directed his brother and the other young men to follow the trail with proper caution, while he himself still adhered to the river path, which led through clusters of willows directly to the point where he supposed the enemy to lie. Having examined the priming of his gun, he crept cautiously through the bushes, until he had a view of the point of embarkation. Here lay two canoes, empty and apparently deserted. Being satisfied, however, that the Indians were close at hand, he relaxed nothing of his vigilance, and quickly gained a jutting cliff, which hung immediately over the canoes. Hearing a low murmur below, he peered cautiously over, and beheld the object of his search. The gigantic Big Foot, lay before him in the shade of a willow, and was talking in a low deep tone to another warrior, who seemed a mere pigmy by his side. Andrew cautiously drew back, and cocked his gun.—The mark was fair—the distance did not exceed twenty feet, and his aim was unerring. Raising his rifle slowly and cautiously, he took a steady aim at Big Foot's breast, and drew the trigger. His gun flashed. Both Indians sprung to their feet with a deep interjection of surprise, and for a single second all three stared at each other. This inactivity, however, was soon over. Andrew was too much hampered by the bushes to retreat, and setting his life upon the cast of the die, he sprung over the bush which had sheltered him, and summoning all his powers, leaped boldly down the precipice and alighted upon the breast of Big Foot with a shock which bore him to the earth. At the moment of contact, Andrew had almost thrown his right arm around the neck of the smaller Indian, so that all three came to the earth together.

At that moment a sharp firing was heard among the bushes above, announcing that the other parties were engaged, but the trio below were too busy to attend to any thing but themselves. Big Foot was for an instant stunned by the violence of the shock, and Andrew was enabled to keep them both down. But the exertion necessary for that purpose was so great that he had no leisure to use his knife. Big Foot quickly recovered, and without attempting to rise, wrapped his long arms around Andrew's body, and pressed him to his breast with the crushing force of a Boa Constrictor!—Andrew, as we have already remarked, was a powerful man, and had seldom encountered his equal, but never yet had he felt an embrace like that of Big Foot. He instantly relaxed his hold of the small Indian, who sprung to his feet. Big Foot then ordered him to run for his tomahawk which lay within ten steps, and kill the white man, while he held him in his arms. Andrew, seeing his danger, struggled manfully to extricate himself from the folds of the giant, but in vain. The lesser Indian approached with his uplifted tomahawk, but Andrew watched him closely, and as he was about to strike, gave him a kick so sudden and violent, as to knock the tomahawk from his hand, and send him staggering into the water. Big Foot uttered an exclamation in a tone of deep contempt at the failure of his companion, and raising his voice to the highest pitch, thundered out several words in the Indian tongue, which Andrew could not understand, but supposed to be a direction for a second attack. The lesser Indian now again approached, carefully shunning Andrew's heels, and making many motions with his tomahawk, in order to deceive him as to the point where the blow would fall. This lasted for several seconds, until a thundering exclamation from Big Foot, compelled his companion to strike. Such was Andrew's dexterity and vigilance however, that he managed to receive the tomahawk in a glancing direction upon his left wrist, wounding him deeply but not disabling him. He now made a sudden and desperate effort to free himself from the arms of the giant and suceeded. Instantly snatching up a rifle (for the Indian could not venture to shoot for fear of hurting his companion) he shot the lesser Indian through the body. But scarcely had he done so when Big Foot arose, and placing one hand upon his collar, and the other upon his hip, pitched him ten feet into the air as he himself would have pitched a child. Andrew fell upon his back at the edge of the water, but before his antagonist could spring upon him he was again upon his feet, and stung with rage at the idea of being handled so easily, he attacked his gigantic antagonist with a fury which for a time compensated for inferiority of strength. It was now a fair fist fight between them, for in the hurry of the struggle neither had leisure to draw their knives. Andrew's superior activity and experience as a pugilist, gave him great advantage.—The Indian struck awkwardly, and finding himself dropping to leeward, he closed with his antagonist, and again hurled him to the ground. They quickly rolled into the river, and the struggle continued with unabated fury, each attempting to drown the other. The Indian being unused to such violent exertion, and having been much injured by the first shock in his stomach, was unable to exert the same powers which had given him such a decided superiority at first; and Andrew, seizing him by the scalp lock, put his head under water, and held it there, until the faint struggles of the Indian induced him to believe that he was drowned, when he relaxed his hold and attempted to draw his knife. The Indian, however, to use Andrew's own expression, "had only been POSSUMMING!"—He instantly regained his feet, and in his turn put his adversary under.

In the struggle, both were carried out into the current, beyond their depth and each was compelled to relax his hold and swim for his life. There was still one loaded rifle upon shore, and each swam hard in order to reach it, but the Indian proved the most expert swimmer, and Andrew seeing that he should be too late turned and swam out into the stream, intending to dive and thus frustrate his enemy's intention. At that instant, Adam, having heard that his brother was alone in a struggle with two Indians, and in great danger, ran up hastily to the edge of the bank above, in order to help him. Another white man followed him closely, and seeing Andrew in the river, covered with blood, and swimming rapidly from shore, mistook him for an Indian and fired upon him, wounding him dangerously in the shoulder. Andrew turned, and seeing his brother, called loudly upon him to "shoot the big Indian upon the shore." Adam's gun, however, was empty, having just been discharged. Fortunately, Big Foot had also seized the gun with which Andrew had shot the lesser Indian, so that they both were upon an equality. The contest now was who should load first. Big Foot poured in his powder first, and drawing his ramrod out of its sheath in too great a hurry threw it into the river, and while he ran to recover it, Adam gained an advantage. Still the Indian was but a second too late, for his gun was at his shoulder, when Adam's entered his breast. The gun dropped from his hands and he fell forward upon his face upon the very margin of the river. Adam, now alarmed for his brother, who was scarcely able to swim, threw down his gun and rushed into the river in order to bring him ashore—but Andrew, more intent upon securing the scalp of Big Foot as a trophy, than upon his own safety, called loudly upon his brother to leave him alone and scalp the big Indian, who was now endeavoring to roll himself into the water, from a romantic desire, peculiar to the Indian warrior, of securing his scalp from the enemy. Adam however, refused to obey, and insisted upon saving the living, before attending to the dead. Big Foot, in the meantime had succeeded in reaching the deep water before he expired, and his body was borne off by the waves, without being stripped of the ornament and pride of an Indian warrior.

Not a man of the Indians had escaped. Five of Big Foot's brother's, the flower of the Wyandott nation, had accompanied him in the expedition, and all perished. It is said that the news of this calamity, threw the whole tribe into mourning. Their remarkable size, their courage, and their superior intelligence, gave them immense influence, which, greatly to their credit, was generally exerted on the part of humanity. Their powerful interposition, had saved many prisoners from the stake, and had given a milder character to the warfare of the Indians in that part of the country. A chief of the same name was alive in that part of the country as late as 1792, but whether a brother or a son of Big Foot, is not known. Andrew Poe recovered from his wounds, and lived many years after his memorable conflict; but never forgot the tremendous "hug" which he sustained in the arms of Big Foot.

MORAL MEN FOR OFFICE.

We are glad to see the attention of the public directed to the importance of selecting for public officers, men of sound moral principles, as well as talent and capacity. By neglecting this rule, which was strictly adhered to by our ancestors, we have exposed ourselves to many evils. The extracts below, will illustrate the feeling on this subject, which is beginning to be developed in the west:

The Chicago Democrat, in one respect, has adopted a course which has our hearty approbation. It insists that its party should select as its candidates for office, men of good moral character. Strange as it may appear, the Democrat has the best reasons for urging this policy. It is due to its party, to the State, and we may well say, it is due to our young and rising city, that the individuals who are sent here to act for the people, should be men of "pure hearts and clean hands." The exhibitions which were presented last winter in our city, were disgraceful and disgusting. It seems in some cases as if men forgot that they had families, and reputations to sustain, and gave themselves up to low and depraved passion. Although we have not before adverted to this matter, we have felt pleasure in noticing the remarks alluded to in the Democrat. We hope the editor will continue them. They are worthy the attention of considerate men of all parties.—Sagamo Journal.

The proceeding remark has our hearty cooperation. It is applicable alike to both parties, and we trust will enter into their consideration in the future selection of candidates. As a general principle, no State has aught to fear—we care not which party has the ascendency—whose public servants are honest and upright men. But when their law-makers, or a large portion of them, are addicted to intemperance, gambling, and similar vices, it is useless to expect at their hand sound and wholesome legislation. As well might we expect the Ethiopian to change his color, or the Leopard his spots, as that such men would prove safe and trust-worthy guardians of the public weal.

It is time that the people required at the hands of their public servants, moral as well as political qualifications. This once accomplished, and we can with confidence look forward for brighter prospects to dawn upon our mis-governed State.—Alton Telegraph.

The sentiments contained in the above paragraphs meet our hearty approbation.—The defalcations of public officers—the bankruptcy of States, arising from the misconduct of their rulers and the depravity of their legislators—which have been witnessed for a few years past, admonish the people that "moral as well as political qualifications" are necessary in their public servants.—Milwaukie Sentinel.

LADIES TOO MUCH FOR LAWYERS.—An intelligent female witness having been much perplexed by a barrister in a long cross-examination, happened, in replying, to use the term humbug. "Madam, (said the man of law) you must not talk unintelligibly; what is the court and jury to understand by the word humbug?" The lady hesitated. "I must insist, madam," said the barrister (anticipating victory,) "that you proceed no farther until you state plainly, and openly, what you mean by a humbug. "Why, then, sir," returned the lady, "I don't know how better to explain my meaning than by saying, if I met a company of persons who were strangers to you, and should tell them that when they saw you they might prepare to meet a remarkably handsome, genteel, agreeable looking man—that would be a humbug.

RECESSION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

The last number of the Hingham Patriot contains the following sketch of some of Mr. Lyell's views, expressed before the Lowell institute, on the subject of the falls of Niagara:

"The Lecture which Mr. Lyell gave last Saturday, contained some statements so very curious and interesting, that I can not forbear giving you a little account of them. His subject was the Recession of Niagara Falls. He presented to his audience a very beautiful bird's eye view (somewhat resembling the style of Theater scenery,) of the whole country from Lake Erie, and including a portion of that lake, to Lewiston, and Queenston, about half way between the falls and Lake Ontario. The view was designed by Bakewell, son of the great English geologist, and painted by Russel Smith of Philadelphia, an artist whose skill is well known. It gave a distinct view of the whole course of the Niagara river, from the lake as far down as those two towns, including, of course, the falls. These towns, the latter on the Canada, the former on the American side of the river, are built just under a precipitous cliff, 470 feet high; the scenery about which is so beautiful and grand, that the lecturer said it would be well worth visiting, even if there were no falls near, and no other attraction.

"This cliff is seven miles from the falls, and the learned lecturer supposes that its base, and the whole surrounding country below was once covered by a vast inland sea, of which the present lakes are but small remains—that, after the removal of this sea, Niagara river poured over this cliff—that then the falls were perhaps 200 feet higher than they now are, for there is now a gradual descent in the river of 100 feet between the present falls and Queenston—that the falls have been gradually wearing away this cliff underneath this river, until it is now seven miles above where it used to be! that the falls are receding and diminishing in height year by year, till in the course of time, should the world last long enough, there will be no Niagara Falls at all, they having backed quite into Lake Erie! In their place there will be only irregular rapids. He said there was certain and incontrovertible geological proof that they had receded three miles, and it was presumable, from the face of the country and its geological structure, that they had the whole seven. The settlement of that region had been so recent, that of course history can shed little light on the matter; yet even during the short period that has elapsed since the whole country was a wilderness of bears and savages, there is historical proof of a great change.

"The first account of the falls that ever appeared in print was written by a Jesuit, who visited them in 1678, one hundred and sixty-three years ago; and there was then according to his description, and according to the engraving that accompanies it, another fall, from west to east, in front of and across those now existing, formed by the westerly side of the river running against Table rock. A considerable portion of the edge of this rock has fallen away, and, of course, the extra cataract caused by it has gone. He said that persons living in that vicinity told him that they could perceive a recession of about one yard per year; those who had lived there fifty years said the falls had receded fifty yards in that number of years. Mr. Lyell said that he visited that region in company with a distinguished geologist who had been there five years before, and who said he could perceive there had been a considerable change during that period. And who do you think that fellow-traveler was? James Hall, once a Hingham boy, now one of the first Geologists in America. The falls are now 160 feet high; 760 years hence, Mr. Lyell said, computing according to the past, they would be but 120 feet high; and he gave the date, (I have forgotten how far into the regions of futurity it was) when they would be only 80 feet high—just half their present height! He referred also to artificial causes, canals, mills and factories, which are turning off the water of the lakes, and will help to diminish the grandeur of the falls."

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now effered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

ROOF'S FOUNDER OINTMENT,

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

Historical Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion.

LECTURE III.---THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY G. M. LANGWORTHY.

There remains to be considered, in our present lecture, only the sufferings of the original witnesses, and the undesigned coincidence which is found in their testimony.

1. As to the sufferings of the followers of this New Faith, the nature of the case affords us presumptive evidence of the fact. What but persecution could a set of men expect, who, starting up amidst the many religions with which they were surrounded, and to which thousands adhered with such tenacity that they could not endure to hear their sect evil spoken of, go forth unhesitatingly, and preach down all other religions, descrying and setting them at nought, and telling men that there was no other way of salvation except by embracing their religion? The case would have been very different, if the apostles had only claimed a place for their religion, among the other religions of the day, and discussed the merits of Christ to be an object of worship, without denouncing any other gods as false, or any other worship as vain. It was customary among the heathen world to increase the number of their gods whenever circumstances seemed to require it; and also for one nation to worship the gods of another. But in so doing they did not renounce the worship of the gods of their own country. They only paid an act of civility to their neighbors which they expected to receive in turn.—When, therefore, the apostles set themselves up as the defenders of an exclusive religion, a religion which accepted no compromise, and acknowledged no other worship as good, except the worship which itself taught, it is very natural to suppose that the heathen world, incensed at such conduct, would rise and do all in their power to put a stop to the spread of such a religion as this.

Again, What were the first christians to expect from the Jews? As addressed to them it was opposed to those opinions upon which their hopes, their consolation, their pride, and their partialities were founded.—This people supposed, that by the advent of the Messiah, they were to be delivered from all earthly bondage, made a free and independent nation, and exalted high in the scale of earthly honor. This nation had been so instilled into the minds of the common people by the rulers, that it could not be called a conjecture of theoretical divines, or the secret hope of a few recluse devotees, but it was undoubting, and impatient of contradiction.

The Jews clung to this hope under every misfortune of their country, and with more tenacity as their dangers or calamities increased. To find, therefore, that expectations so gratifying, were to be worse than disappointed, that they were to end in the diffusion of a mild, unambitious religion, which, instead of victories and triumphs—instead of exalting their nation and institution above the rest of the world, was to advance those whom they despise to an equality with themselves, in those very points of comparison, in which they most valued their distinction, could be no very pleasing discovery to the Jews, nor could the messengers of such intelligence expect to be well received, or easily credited.

There is another respect, also, in which the gospel was opposed to Jewish prejudices. It was for annihilating all that outward pomp and show in its ceremonies, upon which the Jew so much prided himself; and instead thereof, it would have well regulated affections, inward purity, and moral rectitude of disposition, as the true ground of acceptance with God. This, however rational it may appear to us, was no pleasure to the Jews; and when in addition to this, we remember that the Jews were the very ones that caused Christ to be put to death, and that the apostles would be very likely to remind them of it, we have no reason to expect from Jewish pride any thing less than active opposition.

With regard to the interference of the Roman government then established in Judea, we have no reason to suppose that, despising as it did the religion of the country, it would at first take notice of any religious contentions that might arise, as they would look upon any religion except pagan, attempting to establish itself in that country, as only a modification of Judaism, and differing from the common faith only in "certain questions of their own superstition." But in the course of a few years, when they began to see the unlooked-for success of christianity, and the magnitude of its pretensions, we might expect that the Romans would look with hostility upon such a religion, and engage in measures of extermination against its advocates.

That such was the fact, and that persecution and martyrdom was the general lot of early christians, is a fact to which both sacred and profane authors testify.

Tacitus, speaking of the fire which happened at Rome in the time of Nero, and of the suspicions which were entertained that the Emperor himself was the author of it, says, "But neither these exertions, nor his largesses to the people, nor his offerings to the gods, did away the infamous imputation under which Nero lay of having ordered the city to be set on fire. To put an end, therefore, to this report, he laid the guilt and inflicted the most cruel punishments upon a set of people who were holden in abhorrence for their crimes, and called by the vulgar Christians. The founder of that name was Christ, who suffered death under his procurator, Pontius Pilate. This pernicious superstition, thus checked for a while, broke out again, and spread not only over Judea, where the evil originated, but through Rome also, whither every thing bad upon the earth finds its way, and is practiced. Some who confessed their sect, were first seized, and afterward by their information, a vast multitude were apprehended, who were convicted, not so much of the crime of burning Rome, as of hatred to mankind. Their sufferings at their execution were aggravated by insult and mockery; for some were disguised in the skins of wild beasts, and worried to death by dogs; some were crucified; others were wrapped in pitched spirits, and set on fire when the day closed, that they might serve as lights to illuminate the night. Nero lent his own gardens for these executions, and exhibited at the same time a mock Circensian entertainment; being a spectator of the whole, in the dress of a Christian, sometimes mingling with the crowd on foot, and sometimes viewing the spectacle from his car. This conduct made the sufferers pitied; and tho' they were criminals, and deserving the severest punishments, yet they were considered as sacrificed, not so much out of a regard to the public good, as to gratify the cruelty of one man.

"In this persecution St. Paul was beheaded, and St. Peter crucified with his head downwards; which manner of death he chose, as being more dishonorable than that of his Master."—Goldsmith's Rome, p. 175.

Suetonius, who was contemporary with Tacitus, in a description of the same transactions says, "The Christians, a set of men of a new and mischievous (or magical) superstition, were punished." It is highly probable that Suetonious has reference here to some more general persecution, than that mentioned by Tacitus, since he does not mention the burning of Rome as the pretence of their sufferings; nor does he specify that the Roman Christians were all that suffered.

Juvenal, a writer of the same age with the two former, intending as it would seem to commemorate the cruelties of Nero and those under his influence says, "Describe Tigellinus, (a creature of Nero,) and you shall suffer the same punishment with those who stand burning in their own flame and smoke, their head being held up by a stake fixed to their chin, till they make a long stream of blood and melted sulphur on the ground."

Pliny, the younger, in his letter to Trojan, about 70 years after Christ's death, gives us to understand that the christians were exposed to sufferings and cruelties in Bithynia and Pontus, without any public persecution being denounced against them by the sovereign power: For, from Pliny's doubt how he ought to act, his silence concerning any existing law upon the subject, his requesting the emperor's rescript, and the emperor, agreeably to his request, propounding a rule for his direction, without reference to any prior rule, it may be safely inferred that there was, at that time, no public edict in force against the christians.

Yet from this same epistle we learn that "accusations, trials and examinations were, and had been, going on against them in the provinces over which he presided; that schedules were delivered by anonymous informers, containing the names of persons who were suspected of holding, or of favoring the religion; that in consequence of these informations many were apprehended, of whom some boldly avowed their profession, & died in the cause; others denied that they were christians, others acknowledging that they had long since ceased to be such."

This testimony of Pliny proves, that the profession of Christianity was at that time, and in that country, attended with danger, and that notwithstanding there was no edict from the Roman sovereign against the christians at that time, such was the abhorrence in which they were held in general, that whoever had the boldness to embrace it jeopardized his life.

Martial, who wrote a few years anterior to Pliny, made the sufferings of christians a subject of ridicule. His testimony, however, as well as Pliny's, goes to show that the deaths of these men were martyrdoms, in the strictest sense of the word; that is, that they were entirely voluntary, and could have been avoided by joining the heathen religion.

And here let me ask, as I have done before, is it possible for men to endure all this suffering, which is here described by heathen writers, and which we may well judge was but a small part of all their actual sufferings, to support what they knew to be false? It appears to me that it is not in human nature to endure such a reproach; and I am certain that Epictetus would sooner have believed that the christian religion were true, than that these men testified to a known falsehood, when he says, "Is it possible that a man may arise at this temper and become indifferent to those things from madness or from habit, as the Galileans. Let this preparation of the mind (to die) arise from its own judgement and not from obstinacy, like the christians."

SHORT SERMONS TO PASTORS.

Acts ix 6.—What wilt thou have me to do.

Dear Brother.—We have already seen that this question is one which ought to be asked by every accountable being, at every stage of his existence. It is the first and the chief question we should propose when laying our plan of life; and at every step of our earthly career we should continue with all humility to repeat it at the throne of grace. You and I are presumed thus to have inquired of God, before we sought the sacred, the sacred office; and we are presumed to be still inquiring for our Lord's will as the rule of our duty. Let us in this brief discourse, consider what topics are involved in this question, and thus we will have the way prepared for pointing out, in a subsequent sermon, the answer which comes to every pastor, from the oracle of God.

1. The will of the Lord is the rule of duty. "What wilt thou?" asked Saul.—His enquiry was not, what will the world think? What will most promote my worldly honor, or my ease and comfort? What will be best for the interests of my family? He did not even ask what would be best to be done? He did not ask to be assured of the expediency of any course that might be proposed. His Lord's will was all he sought to know. So we should inquire, in regard to our official duties, simply for the will of the Lord. Not what is expedient? what will promise, in human judgement, the readiest success in any kind of effort? Not what will suit the spirit of the age? What will be popular? But what does the Lord will?

2. Service must be rendered. We must be doing for our Lord. The relation of Lord and servant necessarily supposes the requiring and rendering of service, until we should be permitted "to enter into rest," we must stay toiling in the field. "Occupy till I come."

3. It is for our personal duty we should inquire, "What wilt thou have me to do?" Not as Peter asked, "Lord what shall this man do?" But our inquiry should be for our own duty. Now although there are duties that are regular and common to all pastors; yet each has something peculiar in himself and in his circumstances and location, which imposes special duties upon him which may not be incumbent upon all. And in the progress of the church exigencies will arise which will be continually starting new questions of duty. Hence the necessity of constant and careful inquiry for our personal duty. Each pastor should inquire what the Lord has committed to him; and what he requires of him. In every exigence, and in reference to every matter that claims our official notice, we should ask, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

The Lord give us such a spirit; the Lord dispose our hearts to an honest inquiry for the path of duty; and in my next sermon I propose to collect an answer to this important inquiry, from the word and providence of God. POIMEN.

HOW A CHURCH MAY DESTROY THE INFLUENCE OF THEIR MINISTER.

First, By not being punctual in the payment of his salary. Most of the churches at this day engage their ministers by the year, for a stipulated sum. This is generally what the minister supposes he and his family can barely live on, with a common providence, for the year to come. Churches do not believe in making their ministers rich; and if a country pastor, with a small family, receives two hundred and fifty or three hundred dollars per year, in a church of flourishing farmers, it is supposed to be as much as he ought to have. Now this, with good economy and health, if he receives it all at a proper time, may support his family through the year; but his first quarter is out, he gets one-half or two-thirds of his salary; this is all expended, and he has been obliged to contract some small debts, which he expected to be able to pay at the close of his first quarter; but as he finds himself destitute of the means he is unable to do it; and so it passed to the next quarter, and so on to the last.—The minister feels the demand of his creditor to be just; he knows it ought to be paid, and a weighty affliction grows out of his inability to do it. With this affliction he has to enter upon all his intellectual pursuits. He goes into his study and commences his search for the truth; perhaps he reads Rom. xiii. 8: "Owe no man any thing." Then comes up his debt: "O! when shall I pay Mr.——? It is his due, I should have paid it long since; he will go to New York soon, and he expects his pay before he goes; but I cannot pay him as things are now. Well, I will go out and tell him as well as I can, and not expose the credit of my people. O that they knew how I feel this morning! Thus goes one good hour in spite of himself.

Now he does not see that to pursue his studies under such circumstances without embarrassment, he must be as reckless to his engagements as those upon whom he depends are to theirs! and could they believe him so they would not fellowship him as a preacher. The man to whom he is indebted both blames and pities him; blames him for getting into debt, and pities his hard fortune. And though he does not tell him just how he feels, he concludes he will not trust him again. Thus his influence and credit are sacrificed to the cruel negligence of his people.

Again, this is a day of enterprise in the church, and if a minister is what he ought to be he is able to tell his people what the denomination are doing; show them the claims of God; present the cry of those who are ready to perish through the lack of knowledge; and to enforce his appeals from existing facts; and them to give to the cause of God until they get rich in giving.

Furthermore, this is a day when errors of almost every description are rife in the land; and a minister needs to know their strong holds—to be acquainted with those works and reviews in which they were exposed and refuted: that he may be able to oppose with success whatever is not according to sound doctrine, before it shall exert its withering influence upon the church. In order to do this the minister must be furnished with the means of information.—These means cost money; and while the church withhold his due he can not obtain them, consequently that influence which he ought to exert, and would were it not for his embarrassments, is lost.

Secondly, A church may destroy the influence of their pastor by conforming to the spirit of the world. He preaches transforming influence of the gospel of Christ upon the heart and life of the believer. He tells what a christian is in principles, his joys, and his hopes. The sinner begins to look for a demonstration of this truth in those whom he acknowledges as the very persons who have this transforming power. He sees them selfish and covetous, and as much in love of the world as he can believe himself to be. He beholds them as the leaders of every vain fashion, and, though "dead in trespasses and sin," he has to much discernment not to see a great difference between the ministers preaching and such professors. In conversation they are vain—talk of everything but religion, and a precious Savior. Oh! that such professors knew their pastor's feelings when he retires alone and throws himself before the Lord, crying with the prophet; "Woe is me! for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips." Said Paul, "Ye are our epistle, written in our hearts, known and read of all men. Be ye not conformed to this world." Until the professors regard the truth of God, in vain a minister preaches.

Third, By neglecting discipline in the church until the pastor is obliged to bring it forward himself. The certain effect of this will be to weaken his influence. Party feelings will creep in against him, and the peace of the church be destroyed; vain jangling will be substituted for those expressions of love which have so happy an effect in promoting the peace of Zion.

Fourth, By disregarding his advice and measures for the advancement of the cause of truth. It belongs to him by virtue of his office as pastor under Christ, to lead, as well as to "feed the flock of God." And when he sees the cause of the Savior calls for an additional prayer-meeting, or any effort by the church to engage in that work heartily as unto the Lord, unless some good reason can be shown for deferring it.

But suppose he propose to his brethren to hold an additional prayer meeting; "O, it will do no good if we try; it will all fall through;" and so they refuse to engage in it. He recommends a religious periodical, but they are too poor to take it. He advises the mothers in the church to form themselves into a maternal association, and take the Mother's Monthly Journal; the church to hold a monthly concert of prayer; but all these things are met with a coldness which clearly says: "We wish you had said nothing about them." The pastor begins to feel if he can do good any where it must be in some other location; hence his influence is lost, and the church are left to be "filled with their own ways." PHILARETOS.

DIALOGUE.

THE QUARREL WITHOUT A CAUSE.

E. Why don't you give it up then?

B. There is indeed no good reason why I should not; but brother C. has no better grounds for his hard feelings, than I have for mine. He has been offended with me for years, and is even now almost as bitter against me as ever. He will not yield a hair; nor has he ever manifested any inclination whatever to confess his fault.—And now I am determined, since he is altogether in the wrong, and stands it out so, that I'll be even with him, and hold on where I am until I shall see some signs of confessing in him.

E. Well, brother C, you hear brother B's statement, and his strong determination, and may I now as a friend ask, why you don't give it up?

C. My reason is similar to brother B's He first committed the offence, and has never shown the least sign of repentance, and certainly I feel under no obligation to go to him for reconciliation, or even to forgive him, and receive him into my fellowship, until he asks for forgiveness.

E. This surely is a hard case brethren; but what is the particular point of your difficulty—this hard bone of contention?

B. Why, really I can't tell just now.—There has, certainly for some years, been a bitter strife between us; but what is the particular cause of it, I don't know. It happenned so long ago, I have now forgotten it; but I think it was something which brother C. said or did once, about the church, or the minister—I don't recollect what, this much, however, I do know—He is to blame, and I never laid even one straw in his way.

C. The cause of our difficulty? Why, I know no more about it than brother B. does; but I am confident that he said something some years since, which at the time most cruelly hurt my feelings, and I resolved then, that he should either confess to me or to somebody else, or I never would forgive him; but what that thing was I don't now quite remember. It was, however, something which made me feel very bad, and I have not yet forgotten how I felt; but as for injuring him, why, I never thought of such a thing.

E. My brethren, your cause, I see, is not only a hard one, but it is a very strange one too. You both are greatly offended with each other—each says that the other has wronged him, yet knows not what that wrong is—and each asserts, that he is not conscious of injuring the other, or ever of intending to do so. Why, now I pray, cannot this sad affair, which has so long kept you alienated from each other, be at once settled? Did you ever think, how dreadful a thing it is, for one to be angry with his brother without a cause? And of this difficulty of yours, neither seems to know the cause. I fear, that there is something wrong in your hearts—that perhaps your religion runs rather low. Now brethren be honest; does either feel offended with the other; and are not both of you willing to make up friends on the spot? There is in this case, no need why one should be humbled so much more than the other. You can both stand on the same footing, and only confess to each other your sinfulness in indulging this cruel, unforgiving spirit. Just think for once what the Savior says about forgiveness, and then conclude what to do.

B. Well brother C. hadn't we on the whole better give it up? Certainly now I am not angry with you, and I feel as tho' I should never be again. Perhaps I have been a little in the wrong, as well as yourself. I am ready to forgive you, if you are me; and provided I have wronged you in the least, I am heartily sorry.

C. Brother, I am right glad thus to meet you half way in this thing. I never once thought, that it would be so easy a matter either to forgive or to confess. I have been much farther out of the way than you; for I have a long time felt, that it was my duty to make some acknowledgments. Of late, the thought of dying just as we were, has given me no little trouble. And some nights I have scarcely slept at all, when I have happened to think that he who forgives not the trespasses of others, shall not in the end have his own forgiven. Come, give me your hand and Christian fellowship.

B. You have them both; and I trust that never again any dividing foot will step in between us. At least I will do my best to keep the peace and to love you.

C. And so will I in return.

B. Permit me, my brethren, to rejoice with you in your restored friendship; and as a friend to give this one short piece of advice—that you never again fall out by the way, and keep out so long, unless you know assuredly the real cause of the difference. OLD ZACHARY.

POSITION IN PRAYER.

There is a difference among different denominations of Christians in regard to the posture they assume during prayer at public worship on the Sabbath. We find also a difference in this respect among churches of the same denomination; and various positions are sometimes assumed by the different members of the same congregation. Some stand facing the desk, others with their backs turned towards it; some sit upright, others with their faces bowed upon the back of the slips before them, and there may be others still in different positions. Uniformity among the members of the same congregation, to say the least is desirable; for the multifarious positions above described present not only a confused but an irreverent appearance.

We do not recollect as any particular directions are given in the Scriptures in respect to the position of the body during prayer. We have, however, some examples recorded, in which the posture of the individuals engaged in prayer has been described. It is said of Solomon, in 1 Kings vii. 14, "And the king turned his face about, and blessed all the congregation of Israel: and all the congregation of Israel stood." And in verse 54, "When Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer and supplication unto the Lord, from kneeling on his knees, with his hands spread up to heaven." Again in 1 Chron. xxi. 16, "Then David and the elders of Israel, who were clothed in sackcloth, fell upon their faces, and David said unto God, &c.; and it is said of our Savior, in Luke xxii. 41, And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down and prayed;" and in Mat. xxvi. 39, he "fell on his face and prayed." In the account of the death of Stephen, it is recorded in Acts vii. 60, "And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."

These, we believe, are some of the principal examples given in the word of God, which describe the position assumed in prayer. That one posture in prayer may appear more reverent and becoming than another, cannot be denied; yet doubtless God looks at the state of the heart, more than he does at the position of the body. We would advocate, however, that a deeply reverential and appropriate posture should be assumed when we approach into the presence of the Great Searcher of hearts for the purpose of prayer and supplication. In family, social, and private prayer, kneeling is a becoming position, representing humility on the part of the suppliant, and in our opinion accords most with Scripture examples. What Christian, in retiring from the world's contention to hold communion with heaven in the solitude of his closet, would think of engaging in prayer without falling upon his knees before God? No one we presume, unless he possessed the spirit of the Pharisee, who stood in the market-place and thanked God that he was not like other men.

But what position shall a congregation assume during prayer at public worship in the house of God? It was the custom formerly among our churches to arise and stand during prayer, and to remain seated during the exercise of singing. Of late this order in most of our congregations has been reversed. We have no disposition to condemn the change as an innovation deserving censure. We rather prefer it to the old method of our ancestors. A uniform and reverant posture, as was hinted above, is very desirable. Standing is attended with more inconveniences now than formerly, since the introduction of low slips, instead of high pews, affords nothing for the aged and infirm to lean upon for support. Our Episcopal brethren, we believe, have, in their houses of public worship, what is called a kneeling-board attached to the back of the slips, a little elevated from the floor, upon which, during prayers, the persons sitting in the next slip behind, kneel, and bow their heads upon the top of the slip. We can see no objection to this. It is a posture which, exhibits the appearance of humility solemnity, and reverence. As no such provision is made in churches, generally kneeling would be attended with inconvenience. A sitting posture, then, is the best, perhaps, that can be adopted under existing circumstances. At least it is better than the mingling of all postures in the same congregation. And if sitting, during prayers, be adopted, persons should not sit upright gazing listlessly over the assembly. All should incline forward, with their faces bowed upon the back of the slips before them. This posture can be assumed by every worshiper without inconvenience; and if the heart be right, such a position we presume would not be irreverent in the sight of Heaven.

HAVE YOU THE HOLY SPIRIT?—If you have the Holy Spirit, you have seen the evil of sin; you have repented of sin; you have forsaken sin; you hate sin; you watch and pray against sin; you have received the spirit of love. If you have the Spirit of God you love God supremely: you love the Father who gave his Son to suffer and die; you love the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, for what he has done and suffered on your account. You love all the sincere followers of Jesus Christ, and confine not your regards to a party. You love the human race at large, as children of the same family, and you wish them to know the things that belong to their peace.

You are of a forbearing and forgiving temper; you pity and pray for sinners, who through blindness and ignorance, oppose at present their own eternal interests; you are of a thankful spirit; you thank God for making you to differ, by his grace, from many others; and you praise him for every favor, both of a temporal and spiritual nature; you are zealous for the honor of God in the world; you desire to rejoice in Christ Jesus, and in all the duties of Christianity; and you esteem the applause, the pleasure and the wealth of the whole world, as nothing, in comparison of the love and the blessing of God, through Jesus Christ.

Buy the truth and sell it not.—Proverbs.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, May 4, 1842.

Baptist Record and the Sabbath.

The following we find in the Baptist Record, of Philadelphia, in answer to some inquiries of ours :—

We have no disposition to enter into the controversy, whether the seventh or the first day of the week is to be observed as a day of religious service, free from worldly cares and labors, in obedience to the command of God. Our opinion is, and has long been, that the Divine precept is obeyed by the proper observance of either. If, therefore, our seventh-day brethren do religiously observe the seventh-day, believing that it is in accordance with the Divine will, we can cordially give them the hand of Christian fellowship, though we may not feel bound to think or act as they do. We believe we are authorized to keep the first day of the week, and that it becomes us to do it in commemoration of the resurrection of the Savior from the dead; and we also believe, that it would be better, and equally, if not more acceptable to God, for those who now keep the seventh-day, to honor the SON, by celebrating His resurrection, while they preach His gospel. Still we have no controversy with them, because they agree not with us in this sentiment.

But to the questions of the Register. In answer to the first—"where the command is to be found to observe one day in seven as a day of rest from secular cares and labors," &c. we refer the editor to Exodus xx. 8, 9, 10, 11, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: But the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work," &c. We suppose this is a command to observe one day in seven, (the Register will say the seventh day,) as a day of rest, &c. Six days are to be employed in the labor and work necessary to be performed by us, and the following day is to be devoted to the honor of Jehovah. No worldly avocation to be attended to; no burdens to be borne; no secular work to be done. See Jeremiah xvii. 21, 22,. That by the Jews, the day to be observed was the seventh we admit, but after the resurrection of Christ, which took place on the first day of the week; and after the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, on the first day of the week, the Apostles, filled with the Holy Spirit, observed that day in commemoration of that glorious event, by which the completion of the great work of redemption was assured to them. "Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them, ready to depart on the morrow." Acts xx. 7. In following their inspired example, and occupying the first day of the week as a day of rest from secular labor, and as a day of Christian worship, we are sure we cannot very greatly err, or if in error, we are quite willing to be found in company with the Apostles of the Lord.

The second question proposed is, "where is the proof that any day of the week is in Scripture called Lord's day?" John, when he received the revelation of things concerning the church in all ages, says of himself, "I was in the Spirit, on the Lord's day," &c. Rev. i. 10. Here is certainly proof that some day, whether the first or not is not the question proposed, that some day was called the Lord's day, and it must have been one of the days of the week. We suppose it was the day which had been observed in honor of the Lord Jesus Christ, and on which he therefore appeared to his servant to make the important communications, which are contained in this book. But without insisting on this, the Register will have some difficulty to get over the proof that one day of the week is in Scripture called the Lord's day. R.

We wonder not a little that Br. Rhees should be so free to fellowship S. D. Baptists, and not Pædo-Baptists, since the latter prove their Pædo-baptism by the same kind of arguments that he proves his Sabbath of the first day of the week. Latitudinarianism, that will make any thing do, is good enough where the Sabbath is concerned.—Why not carry it out, where Pædo-baptism and the peculiarities of the Romish Church is concerned? By this mode we may strip religion of all its peculiarities, and bring it down to the taste of the carnal heart. If the first step is taken, the second must be, and so on, till religion is divested of its sacred character, and every command of God and every precept of the Gospel are declared nonessential. God is specific—Brother Rhees is general. God says the seventh—Br. Rhees says any. Be consistent with yourself Brother, and carry your system out.

Br. Rhees thinks Christ arose on the first day. Well, admit it. What then? Why, the Sabbath, of course, was changed from the seventh to the first day. Proof? The work of redemption was greater than creation; therefore, as the seventh day Sabbath commemorated the creation, the first day must commemorate redemption! But the scripture testimony? Alas! it cannot be found. The fourth command remains immutable—eternal. It has not been annulled, or altered. It remains with all its authority, binding all men to the end of time to keep the seventh day.

The rising of Christ from the grave on the first day has nothing to do with the Sabbath. We might as well infer any thing else as the change of the Sabbath from the resurrection, for nothing of the kind is any where mentioned by the inspired writers.—The first authority we can find for observing the first day, is contained in the order of Constantine in 321.

The editor thinks he finds in the practice of the Apostles authority for observing the first day. Let him look over his evidence, and see if he has any account that they met to Sabbatize, or worship on that day. The passages he has quoted contain no such evidence. The passage in Acts xx. 7, contains the only allusion that is any where made to worship on the first day, and what is that? "Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread. Paul preached unto them, (ready to depart on the morrow,) and continued his speech until midnight," &c. This was an evening meeting, and from the Jewish mode of reckoning time, we must conclude that it was the evening immediately following the seventh day, consequently Paul traveled on the first day; so we find ourselves without evidence that the Apostles observed the first day as a day of rest or worship. But we have abundant proof that they observed the seventh day, as such. See Acts xiii. 14, 42, 44, xvi. 13, xvii. 2, xviii. 4, &c. Now we think, on re-examining the scripture evidence, our brother will find that he is in error, and not "found in company with the Apostles of the Lord."

We are much amused at the adroit manner in which our second question is disposed of. Rev. i. 10, is quoted; "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." Our brother Rhees does not now pretend that this means the first day of the week, and thinks we "will have some difficulty in getting over the proof that one day in the week is in scripture called Lord's day." Heretofore he has called the first day of the week Lord's day. But now when his proof is called for, he dodges the question; his proof is wanting. It is better to retreat than be conquered. We admire the valor. The scriptures nowhere speak of the first day as Lord's day. Nor have we any proof that the passage referred to means "any day of the week."—Nor do we believe it does, any more than the Psalmist means any day of the week when he says, "This is the day the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it."

Church Dedicated.

The S. D. Baptist Church of Hayfield have completed their church edifice, at a cost of $1,200. It was opened for divine worship on the 2d Sabbath in January. The Church acknowledge with gratitude the liberal donations made by brethren of sister churches to aid them. They are enjoying the pastoral labors of Eld. T. B. Brown.

☞The S. D. Baptist Central Association will hold its annual session with the 2d Church in Brookfield, commencing on 4th day before the 2d Sabbath in June next.

FOREIGN NEWS.

A MONTH LATER FROM INDIA.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

The Britannia arrived at Boston on Wednesday of last week, and brought news from Liverpool three days later than that brought by the Great Western. But in the time the overland mail from India for April, had arrived, with full confirmation of the late disastrous news from Affghanistan. The other news is of no importance.

The intelligence from India is to March 31st, just one month later than the previous advices. The Bombay Times of March 1st, says:

"The Cabul tragedy is over. Of the army, which, on the 1st of November, numbered from 12,000 to 16,000, some 200 or 300 only survive in captivity. Not ten men in all have yet escaped from the enemy.—Since the 28th of December, the dates we last gave, 120 British officers, and from 4000 to 5000 fighting men, are known to have perished. One European and three Seapoy regiments have been utterly swept away."

The 44th Regiment, which was utterly destroyed, formed a part of General Packenham's army at New-Orleans. The sufferings of the troops, during 65 days fighting, in the most mountainous country in the world, appear to have been inconceivably dreadful. We annex a summary of the news from the Times:

"The news from India is to the end of January, according to which, it appears that after the death of Sir William. McNaughton, negotiations were resumed by Major Pottinger, and a convention agreed on for the evacuation by the British forces of Jellahabad, Ghuzni, Cabul and Candahar; that in pursuance thereof, the troops, to the number of ten thousand, set out, and were, in defiance of the treaty, all massacred. Two or three natives alone. Gen. Sale has refused to surrender Jellahabad, and is prepared for a vigorous defence. General Elphinstone is not dead, although wounded. He is a prisoner in the hands of Ukbar Khan."

Age of the reigning Sovereigns of Europe. King of Sweden, 78 years; the Pope, 76; King of Hanover, 70; King of the French, 68; of Wurtemburg, 60; of Bavaria, 55; of Denmark, 55; of Belgium, 55; of Sardinia, 53; of Holland, 49; Emperor of Austria, 48; King of Prussia, 48; Emperor of Russia, 45; King of Saxony, 41; of the two Sicilies, 32; of the Greeks, 26; Queen of Portugal, 23; of England, 22; the Sultan, 18; Queen of Spain, 11 years.

It is remarkable that almost all the thrones of Europe have had their sovereigns renewed since 1830; out of 20 there has been 15. The King of Sweden, the senior of them all, dates from the year 1810; the King of Bavaria, 1825; Emperor of Russia, 1826; and Queen of Portugal, 1826.

Congressional News.

From the New-York Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, APRIL 25, 1842.

Funeral—Civil Bills.

The week past has presented little to excite, little to interest, even a stranger. On Tuesday, in the severest storm we have had this spring, the remains of Mr. LAWRENCE, after an impressive sermon from Mr. TUSTON, was consigned to the Congresional cemetery.

On Wednesday the appropriation bill was finally passed by the House, and sent to the Senate, where it will linger some days. This long delay to provide for the officers of the government, is highly criminal. In the long-session years they rarely receive their pay till mid-summer, unless the departments make an arrangement with the banks to anticipate the payment.

The Apportionment.

The apportionment bill was then taken up, and the debate, precisely similar in all its details and objects, to that which occurred in 1822 and '32, and indeed, on every occasion when the same subject has been taken up, commenced and still continues.—It is one of those purely selfish struggles for power that disgusts the listener, and many of the actors in it. Each state struggles for such a ratio as will best suit itself, giving it the largest number and the smallest fraction over. Two slaveholders, J. P. Mason of Md. and Underwood of Ky. have spoken at some length to show the effect of various ratios on the relative power of the slave and free States, differing widely, however, as to what ratio would best preserve the "equilibrium." No ratio will leave the free States less than 50 majority, if series of rates was taken on Tuesday, the result of which indicated a disposition to take a ratio as low as 60,500, if not lower. This would give a House of 258 members; quite large enough for any good purpose.

Impotent malice—a frolic.

Friday was appropriated mainly to the passage of private and local bills, of little importance. The most important was one appointing a term of the U. S. Circuit Court at Cincinnati, instead of holding both terms at Columbus, as heretofore. There was one curious scene, illustrative of the despotism of the slaveocracy in the smallest matters. Under the rules as they now stand, all petitions, memorials and the like, are laid on the speaker's desk, and he decides whether they are receivable or not, Mr. Goode, of Ohio presented, thus, a series of resolves passed by the citizens of Ashtabula Co. at Jefferson, the town in which Mr. Giddings resides, approving his course very warmly, and instructing him, on his return to Congress, to offer again the resolves for presenting which he was censured by the House. They were admirably drawn up. In the morning, the fact of their presentation appeared on the record, much to the displeasure of Mr. Botts, who moved to strike the fact out of the Journal. He accompanied his motion with some very violent remarks, aimed chiefly at Mr. Leavitt, of the Emancipator, who, he said, spent his time, not in reporting the doings of the House, but in abusing its members, calling one half of them overseers, and the other slaves! He declared, on a proper occasion, he should move for his expulsion from the floor of the House! Such a laughable explosion of slaveholding spite has not occurred before, since the session commenced. Truly, as Mr. Botts said, it is very "insolent" for a man with oldfashioned notions of freedom, to criticise the course of "a high functionary of the Government!" But it is a misery Mr. Botts must submit to, with what grace he can. He threatens to include your correspondent in the same motion, because I dared to expose his shameful forgery of professed "extracts" from the addresses of the Am. A. S. Convention, in 1833. But it is to be hoped he will learn the "better part of valor" on further reflection. Truly, the slaveholders are grieved to the soul to see FREEMEN taking notes of their despotism!

Saturday, both Houses thought proper to earn their per diem by a pleasure visit to the splendid war steamers now lying at the Navy Yard, a very pleasant excursion for one of the fairest days of the spring. The weather is indeed charming. It combines the freshness and bloom of early spring, with the warmth of early summer in New York. The mowers were busy last week cutting the grass from the smooth turf of the capital grounds.

A host of tariff petitions come in every day. Perhaps the list of petitions offered on a single morning by one Senator, will give the best idea of their number and variety. It was on Wednesday—

"Mr. Buchanan presented twenty-three memorials from merchants and traders of the city of Philadelphia, stating that they are deeply sensible that nothing will relieve the country more effectually than an increase of duty on imports and the encouragement of domestic manufactures; ten memorials from individuals engaged in various branches of employment in Pennsylvania, and one from Delaware, asking for the restoration of the tariff of 1828; four petitions from Pennsylvania, praying that the duty on iron may be placed at what it was in 1839; the memorial of manufacturers of flour of mustard, asking that Congress may admit mustard seed free of duty, and impose a duty on the flour of mustard; the memorial from manufacturers of chocolate, asking for the imposition of duty on chocolate, and the admission of cocoa free of duty; also, three memorials from Berks county, Pennsylvania, asking for an increase of duty on foreign leather, iron, hats, caps, shoes, ready-made clothing, etc. approving of the Distribution Land Law, and asking for the repeal of the provision of that act which precludes a distribution of the proceeds of the public land from taking place, should the duty on foreign imports go beyond twenty per cent."

News of the Day.

Mr. Giddings.—The veteran Gen. Root, heretofore little sympathising in any anti-slavery movement, brought forward in the Senate of New-York, a series of resolutions proposed to be adopted by both branches of the State Legislature, declaring that the resolutions offered by Mr. Giddings, "contained a correct exposition of constitutional law, that ought to govern in such cases, and had a direct relation to a great question, which perhaps may jeopard the peace of the nation;" that they were "properly submitted to the consideration of the House of Representatives, as Congress has the sole power to declare war, and to provide for the national defence;" that the vote of censure "had no ground for its justification;" and that "the eight Representatives from this State who voted in its favor, have no cause of exultation." The resolutions were not acted upon.—Emancipator.

Another Distillery Overthrown.——The Towers, the great whiskey makers at Waterville, have failed for $60,000; a great part of this amount is owing the farmers for grain. Three hundred bushels a day was the average amount of grain that was converted into an article which makes husbands wretches, wives miserable and broken-hearted, children premature orphans—and yet, with these frightful facts staring farmers in the face, they have furnished the daily quota for working this desolation; now they have their pay for it. Let them look at it, and take warning as to their future course. God's hand, depend upon it, is set against the acquisition of gain by the horrid sacrifice of the morals and happiness of our follow-beings. The Washingtonians are dealing destruction to distilleries, and farmers will find it much better to feed their coarse grain to their cattle, than trust it to distillers.—N. Y. Bapt. Reg.

Florida.—The number of Indian warriors now in Florida, is supposed not to exceed 90. A portion of these, under Sam Jones and the Prophet, and now in the Everglades—the rest, under Halleck Tustenuggee and a Creek chief, Oteaka, are in the cave of Withlacooche. Col. Worth has planned a movement with a view to catch the last mentioned band. Six detachments of troops were to march upon them from different directions on the 15th inst. It was quite sickly at Fort Mellon. The prevailing disease was fever and ague.

The Trial of Holmes, the murderous mate of the ill-fated William Brown, which has been in progress at Philadelphia through all last week, on Saturday terminated in a verdict of guilty. The indictment on which he was tried was for manslaughter; and doubtless murder in the first degree would have met the approval of any honest twelve men who might have been empanneled to pass upon its merits. The jury in the present case recommend him to mercy. Did they mean that same kind of mercy which he showed to the sacrificed passengers whom he pitched overboard into the sea to make his boat sit lighter on the water?

The Effect.—The teacher of one of the primary schools in Portsmouth, was recently asked why her school was so full; she replied—"I have a quarter part more scholars, and this from the Washingtonian movement. My new scholars are the children of the reformed. Last winter they were in the street, many of them begging for bread; they are now in school, warmly and comfortably clad."

The Seneca Treaty.—The new arrangement of the treaty with the Seneca and other western Indians in this State, effected by Friends of Philadelphia and Baltimore, provides that such of the Seneca Indians as are opposed to emigration may retain possession of the Cattaraugus and Allegany Reservations—subject to the preemption right of the Ogden Land Company—which two reservations contain over fifty thousand acres of excellent land. The treaty of 1838 is to remain unchanged, except so far as to permit a portion of the Senecas to remain on the lands retained by them. The modification is concurred in by the Company.

Croton Water.—The Commissioner of the Croton Aqueduct gives notice that the water will probably be let into the distribution pipes on or before the 4th of July next. The following is the Tariff of prices fixed for the privilege of using the Croton Water.

Eight hunters (two from four companies) recently arrived at St. Louis from the Rocky mountains, for provisions. They stated that there were fourteen feet of snow on the mountains, and that the hunters were out of provisions, and likely to perish.

The Iron Interest of Pennsylvania.—It was lately shown at a great Tariff Mass Meeting in Philadelphia, from the returns received from the various counties, that there are three hundred and eighty-seven Iron Works in all the State; that these works employ directly sixteen thousand six hundred and sixty-four workmen; and that there are eighty-three thousand three hundred and twenty persons dependent upon them for their support.

Mr. Sargent.—We were pleased to see it stated in the last Temperance Journal, that Mr. Sargent, the well known author of Temperance Tales, has again appeared in public. Parental anxiety and love had induced him to seek relief in a foreign clime; and the subsequent loss of a beloved daughter, whose life was dearer to him than his own, had deprived him of his relish for society, and the responsibilities of public life. But he is still the staunch friend and willing advocate of Temperance. We hope he will resume his pen. His former productions none read without being delighted—few without being profitted.—Ch. Refl.

Free Negroes in Mississippi.—By an act which was passed at the last session of the Mississippi Legislature, every Justice in the State is authorised at the request of a freeholder, to cause any free negro to give security in the sum of one hundred dollars for his good behavior, or to commit him to jail, and after public notice the Sheriff of the county shall sell him. Every free negro is forbidden to enter the State; and if one such is found having emigrated into the State under any pretence whatever, any white citizen may cause him to be punished by the Sheriff with thirty-nine lashes; and if he does not immediately thereafter remove, he is to be sold. Any white person who brings a free negro into the State is liable to a fine not exceeding for the first offence five hundred, and for the second one thousand dollars.—Jour. of Com.

The export of sugar from Philadelphia, during the first quarter of the current year, was one million, four hundred and eleven thousand, seven hundred and seventy-one lbs., about half of which was refined.

The Rt. Rev. Henry Conwell, 2d Roman Catholic Bishop of the Diocese of Philadelphia, died in that city on Friday morning, aged 90 years.

The wheat prospect this spring, appears, from accounts from the western part of this State, and, indeed, throughout the country to be quite as promising as is usual. This is said to be especially true of Michigan.

It is stated that a petition of Benjamin Rathbon, now confined in the State prison at Auburn, signed by the most respectable citizens of Western New-York, and a majority of the members of the New-York Legislature, has been pres[illegible] Seward.

They were taken from a small uninhabited island near the Bonin group, where they had been for some time, having been blown there by a gale, while out fishing in a small boat.

A steam canal-boat has been run between Rochester and Lockport. It is propelled by a paddle wheel fixed at the stern; and from all appearance will answer the purpose, there being scarcely any more swell occasioned, than by the usual manner of towing by horses.

One of the city missionaries of Boston a few days since witnessed a singular scene in that city. In a miserable hovel of a house which he entered, he found a man lying dead, with some of the family drunk about him. In the same room with the corpse a couple were being married—the bridegroom wearing the very clothes which the dead man had just cast off.

Many of the establishments at the West, once engaged in manufacturing whiskey from corn, have commenced converting it into spirit gas. It may be truly said that the progress of the Temperance cause is diffusing light.

Twenty thousand females are out of employment in Canada. The Montreal Times says: "If we had a Lowell in this Province, it would benefit the country more than 60,000 regulars."

The mail between Zanesvill and Lancaster, Ohio, was robbed on the 18th instant. The driver was supposed to be guilty, particularly as he left the next morning. He was followed, apprehended near Pittsburg, and taken back to Zanesville.

A new Temperance house has been opened in Buffalo, and appropriately called the "Pollard House," in honor of the indefatigable and successful Baltimore lecturer.

There was a brillant meteor at Richmond Va. on the 22d inst. about 11 o'clock. It was so luminous that a pin could be picked up in the street. Its direction was from south to north.

The National Intelligencer states, that an offer has been made to the Government, and on favorable terms, for a considerable part of the U. S. Loan, lately authorized by the act of Congress.

Encke's Comet.—This interesting body, which visited our sphere in 1838, having again become visible, I had a fine view of it in Clark's telescope last evening, (the 28th,) from half past seven to a quarter past eight o'clock. It could be distinctly seen even in the Finder, (or small attached telescope,) and therefore may have been previously observed by others, although aided by instruments less powerful than ours. Its figure is nearly round, and its brightness exceeds that of 1838, the light being more dense towards the central parts, and the margin being defined. Indeed, immersed as it is in the evening twilight, it is far more conspicuous than I anticipated. Through the kindness of my friend, S. C. Walker, Esq. of Philadelphia, I received, two days since, a newspaper containing an ephemeris, (giving a few of the computed places of the Comet for the present period,) copied from the London Philosophical Journal. The evenings of the 26th and 27th proved unfavorable for observation; but last evening, an hour after sunset, the Comet was readily found, being indeed so near the place assigned to it in the ephemeris, that it was only necessary to point the telescope to that part of the heavens and the beautiful object at once presented itself. Its position is a little south of the head of Aries. At 7h. 45m. it was about a degree and a half south of Gamma Arietis, near the star Iota, marked 205 on the Astronomical Society's Catalogue.

Next to Halley's Comet, this body is regarded by astronomers as the most interesting member of the solar system; and, from the frequency of its returns, it has already led to important results, and it will, it is believed, lead to many more, as its future motions are studied and observed.

DENISON OLMSTED.

YALE COLLEGE, March 29th.

The Tax Bill.—We have not yet received a copy of the Act recently passed by our Legislature, to impose a tax of one mill on a dollar, or one dollar on a thousand, of the taxable property of this State; but its leading provisions are thus stated in the Albany Argus. It provides,—

For imposing a mill tax:

For borrowing for the general fund $884,595 31; for the April interest on the canal debt, $241,474 52; for the Chemung Canal, $450,000; for temporary canal loans, $1,000,000; and to preserve the works now in progress, &c., $50,000—in all, $4,199,336 83—in stocks at a rate not exceeding 7 per cent and not less than par.

For appropriating one half the avails of the mill tax to the redemption of the general fund debt, and the remaining half and all the surplus canal revenues to the payment of the canal debt, temporary and permanent.

For investing $1,700,000 of the U. S. deposite fund and $500,000 of the school fund, in the stocks now authorized to be issued:

And for suspending all further expenditures [illegible] the public works in progress, except for [illegible] completion of indispensable jobs, or to [illegible]ve the work already done.

[illegible] Assembly, the bill was sustained by [illegible] majorities; the section provi[illegible] mill tax, by a vote of 71 to 22. [illegible] Senate, on the final passage of the [illegible] votes stood—13 to 11. As we have [illegible] stated, the mill tax, being levied [illegible] $555,299,530 of taxable property, [illegible] yield a nett revenue of about $600,000 [illegible] annum.

It would doubtless have been desirable, in itself considered, to avoid adding to the burdens on the people in the difficult times through which we are passing; and equally so to go on with the public works which are yet in progress. But we are thoroughly satisfied that under existing circumstances, the course adopted by the Legislature is wise and necessary, and that it ought to receive the approbation of every good citizen. The effect of the new law upon the credit of the State cannot fail to be salutary, in as much as it evinces a determination not to increase our debt, but to provide the means for its gradual extinction. It also shows the willingness of the people to be taxed, so far as may be necessary to meet their engagements promptly. Take it all in all, we consider the enactment of this law the most propitious circumstance, in reference to our State finances, which has happened in a long period; and we cannot doubt that it will be as triumphantly sustained by the people, as it has been by the Legislature.—Jour. of Com.

Bit of a Fight.—The Philadelphia correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot gives the following extract from a private letter, dated

RIO DE JANEIRO, Feb. 13, 1842.

A few days since a large ship: (a slaver) sailed from this port under American colors, for the African coast. An English frigate, which was laying in port, knew her destination, and determined to capture her. They met a few miles outside the harbor; the frigate sent her boat to board the American ship; the officer in command was told to keep off or they would fire into him; the boat kept on, when the Yankee let loose a gun upon him. The commander of the John Bull frigate then hailed that he would fire into him if he did not heave to: "Fire and be d—d," was the reply, accompanied by a broadside from the well-trained guns of the Yankee, which carried away the fore and main yards of the frigate. The fellow crowded all sail and was out of the range of the frigate's guns before he well knew what was the matter with him. I saw the frigate afterwards; her main was down, and they were in the act of sending down the fore, which I could see had been much damaged. The Englishman declares that he will have the ship if he loses his own vessel in the undertaking.

The number of citizens of Baltimore, who have signed the memorial to Congress, in favour of sustaining American Industry, is upwards of NINE THOUSAND, AND THE LENGTH OF THE MEMORIAL IS FIFTY-SIX YARDS.

Further Examination of Bork.—The afternoon examination of witnesses at the Police Office yesterday, resulted in the corroboration of the testimony given by Mrs. Row the principal witness, and some additional facts tending still more to fix upon Bork the cool commission of a crime at which a fiend might tremble. He told one of the witnesses that he had "killed his wife, and meant to do it three months ago!" And when told by the conclusion of the testimony, that he had the privilege to say what he chose for himself, he replied that he had nothing to say except that he "had done perfectly right, and just as any other person in his situation would have done!" But the appearance and actions of the wretched man did not sanction this apparent indifference. He was restless and nervous, and the workings of his features told of the tumult of a mind ill at ease, and a conscience aroused and alarmed.

We subjoin the following testimony taken before the Coroner, from the report in the Daily Advertiser:

The Inquest.—An inquest was held on the body of the deceased by B. C. Allen, Coroner.

Margaret Bork testified that she was the daughter of the deceased—was 11 years old last September—first saw her father this morning when he got up—after he got up, he took a pitcher and went to a grocery and got a pitcher of water—when he came back witness and deceased had had their breakfast—her father refused to have his breakfast—he is a tailor by trade—after sitting at his work a short time, he put on his vest and hat and went out, when deceased requested witness to go and tell Mr. Munsell not to let him have any more liquor—witness went but did not see Munsell—she then returned home and on looking out of the window saw her father go into Keys' grocery—he then came home; deceased said to him if he did not stop going down the street for liquor she would tell his cousin, John Burton; he said it was none of John Burton's business: he then got up and said he would dress himself and take a walk—deceased then took both of her father's hats and set them down beside her, so that he could not get them—he then undressed himself and went to bed, he laid in bed perhaps a quarter of an hour, he then got up, dressed himself and went down stairs—he was gone a very short time and came back again with an axe in his hand—at the time he came up, deceased was sitting at the front window—when he came in he gave a blow with the axe—witness saw him lift the axe and with it strike the deceased—after he struck her, she said oh! and shrunk on the floor—witness ran down stairs and called Mrs. Row—witness, Mrs. Row and others, went up stairs—when they got up stairs, the deceased was lying on her back on the floor and her father was dressing himself—some one said, send for the doctor, there may be some hope of life, then her father said, "if I did not think she was dead I would knock her brains out, now I have killed her I will abide by the consequence."

From this evidence it would appear that rum was at the bottom of this dreadful crime, and was the prime mover of ungovernable passions. The following is the testimony of Doctors Green and Van Alstyne:

We have this day made a post mortem examination of Mrs. Bork, and find the following injuries inflicted, viz:—A large wound on the top and anterior portion of the head, extending entirely through the integument or scalp, and a fracture of the scull directly under the wound, and a depression of the fractured pieces of the cranium; these are four in number, to the depth of nearly one inch, the fractured portions about three inches in length, and in the widest part one inch in width, including the middle and anterior portion, the pancretal bones are on each side of the saggaital suture, and extending across the corronal suture into the frontal bone, a part of which was much depressed; this wound was supposed to have been made by a blow from the head of an axe, and was sufficient to cause immediate death; also a large cut and bruise on the lower jaw, made by a blunt instrument, the bone fractured into three or four pieces; also another wound on the side of the neck, made with a like instrument—the last mentioned wounds would not have caused instant death. Was unacquainted with the company in the room; saw no person he knew except Dr. Van Alstyne; did not see the prisoner.—Albany Journal.

The War in India.—The attempt of Great Britain to wage an unholy war against the Affghans, appears to meet with much opposition even in that country. The London Morning Chronicle, in speaking of the recent massacre of the English forces in Affghanistan, says:—"The attempted subjection of Affghanistan being immoral in its origin, nothing that has occurred can deprive any future attempt of similar immorality. The Affghans are not rebels or surgents; they owe no fealty or allegiance to the British Crown, and the endeavor of England to deprive them of independence of Spain. The rising at Cabool—bloody, cruel, sanguinary, and brutal though it be—is a movement to achieve independence. It is not insurrection—it is a war. The deadly revenge which animates each Affghan blow is not witout parallel in European struggles for nationality; and the disgusting insult perpetrated on the remains of Sir W. M'Naghten could readily be exemplified during the recent civil war in Spain. If we will conquer semi-barbarous tribes, and fight with a people ignorant of the civilization of western warfare, we cannot complain that their struggle for freedom is as wild as their passions and as remorseless as their wrong."

Out of all the persons on board the unfortunate Medora at the time of her explosion, only 18 escaped unhurt; dead 26, wounded 43.

Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun.—An anecdote is told of the meeting of Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun after the former retired from the Senate, which shows that political strife, though it may for a while deaden the finer feelings of the herat, cannot destroy them, especially in those hearts that beat with generous and manly sensibilities. As Mr. Clay was passing towards the door to leave the Senate chamber, Mr. Calhoun met him—they had not spoken to each other for five years—but they now simultaneously extended their hands; neither spoke, but both wept. At length Mr. Clay said, on parting, "Give my best regards to Mrs. Calhoun." How much more noble was this reconciliation and parting, than if they had separated looking defiance at each other! They had almost spent their lives together in Congress, and at various times stood shoulder to shoulder. Time had passed over both, and the young had become old. One was about to retire, and both must ere long "sleep the sleep that hath no waking." The retirement of the one would leave the other with no companion or rival of his younger days, and it told him emphatically that he too must follow. Thoughts like these soften the heart not wholly indurated, and cause the fountain of generous feeling to gush forth.

A Veto upon sending Books through the Post Office.—The following letter appears in the Madisonian:—

Several Postmasters having expressed doubts, as to the postage properly chargeable on the work described below, I will thank you to publish the following extract of a letter to the Postmaster in Brunswick, Maine. dated 22 April, 1842.

"The publication in question, "Zanoni" under the name of Brother Jonathan, is a pamphlet, in large octavo, not periodical to be rated as three sheets—and the postage under 100 miles within the State, 12 cents; over 100 miles and without the State 18 cents. Fractions of sheets; and the cover of a pamphlet if used for general advertising, is charged as a distinct sheet. The cover of this pamphlet, being filled by intelligence of a general character, and by advertisements relating to a single work—and the Department feeling no disposition to adopt a construction not manifestly just—may be considered, in charging postage, as part of the work.

"The statement on the title-page, that the postage of this supplement is 3 cents under 100 miles and within the State, or 4 1-2 cents over 100 miles and without the State, is the opinion of the publisher, and not that of the Department and should not be regarded as the rule by which Postmasters are to be governed in rating postage.

Yours respectfully,

PH. C. FULLER.

The New York Herald of Sunday, says, that a negotiation has been entered into in London between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett, and that the British foreign Minister took the first step, being induced to do so, probably in consequence of the disastrous news from India. We further learn that the Ashburton mission was never meant to result in any practical settlement—it was intended more as a "make believe" than a reality. But recent events in Europe and Asia, and under the influence of Sir Robert Peel, who has indicated great friendship for the United States, particularly in his recent new tariff, have compelled the British Government to come at once to the point, and settle the preliminaries of a lasting peace. This has been done with Mr. Everett, and the recent special messengers that came by steamers have probably been the bearers of the new propositions for the American government. If this intelligence be correct, every thing looks well for a long peace.

News from Washington confirms the above statement, and says a report is current that the despatches from London, brought by the Great Western, give to our relations with England a favorable aspect.

The County Poor in New York.—From the returns of the Superintendents of the poor it appears that the whole number of paupers relieved or supported at the county poor houses during last year, was 61,203. The number temporarily relived was 16, 241. The number of these who are returned as county paupers is 35,366, and as town paupers, 25,837. The increase in number during the year was 6,713.

The expenses connected with the county poor houses for the year was $385, 742 50. The estimated value of the labor of the paupers was 54,632 22. The average weekly expense of each person has been 59 cents and 6 mills.

Of the persons relieved and supported, there were 9,239 foreigners, 466 lunatics, 258, idiots, and 54 mutes. The number of Children under 16 years of age is 2,173.

The whole expense for the poor since the year 1830, has been $4,748,403 16.—J. of Com.

Slaves in New York.—The Judiciary Committe of the N. Y. Assembly submited a report on the 30th March, accompanied by a bill to repeal the following sections of the Revised Statutes, viz.

"§ 6. Any person not being an inhabitant of this State, who shall be traveling to or from, or passing through this State, may bring with him any person lawfully held by him in slavery, and may take such person with him from the State; but the person so held in slavery, shall not reside or continue in this State more than nine months; and if Such residence be continued beyond that time, such person shall be free.

"§ 7. Any person who, or whose family, shall reside part of the year in this State, and part of the year in any other State, may remove and bring with him, or them from time to time, any person lawfully held by him in slavery, into this State, and may carry such person with him or them, out of this State.

Escape from Death.—The family of John Reed, Esq., in Southfield, Staten Island was dangerously poisoned on Friday evening, 2d inst., by arsenic being put in the tea kettle by a boy living in the family.—Mr. Reed, and his wife being in the city, were expected home to tea, and it is supposed the boy intended the poison for them as he has been heard to say that he would kill Mrs. Reed. The family consisted of two daughters and two hired men, who all drank freely of the tea, and were immediately taken with vomiting, and remained very ill all night, and in the morning the boy confessed that he had done it. The arsenic had been set for the purpose of killing rats. The family are now considered out of danger, except the eldest daughter, who still remains very ill. The boy's name is Abm. Bedell. He has lived in the family over two years. He is now in prison.

After a succession of April weather, showers and sunshine, for several days, the sun came out clearly and mildly yesterday morning, with a bright promise of clear skies.

The season is unusually early and propitious to crops. The corn is waving its green branches merily in the fields, and little spears of plants tell of the whereabouts of our great staple. Flowers and fruits are rejoicing in the fine, growing weather.

The season, is, we are told, more forward than any since 1827.—N. Cour Apr. 9.

Dry Goods.—The winding up of this spring's importations shows a smallness of quantity never surpassed. The Sheridan, which arrived the other day from Liverpool, had 199 packages of dry goods; the South America, now on her way, has 172 packages; and the Geo. Washington has 76 packages only. Of these last, 34 packages are woolens, 4 are worsted stuffs, 4 are cottons, 11 are linens, and 23 hosiery, &c. —Jour. Commerce.

Sobriety.—The town authorities of Boston and Northampton, Mass. have resolved not to issue any licence for the sale of ardent spirits—so that the cause of temperance will be likely to go ahead in these places.

A live Hair Seal was caught in Dighton river and brought to our fish market yesterday. It weighed one hundred pounds, and was four feet in length.—Prov. Journal.

Mrs Trollope is about to commence a new work on America in Colburn's New Monthly. It is to be in the form of a story; and will be entitled "The Barnaby in America."

The value of the fur trade and fisheries along the shores of lakes Huron and Superior, is estimated at $4,000,000 annually, of exports to England. And yet most of the fur used in the United States is bought in London.

As many as two thousand five hundred persons have landed from steamboats at St. Louis, Mo. in a single day.

Missionary Agent.

To the eastern churches and others who may be directly interested, Brother Sherman S. Griswold, an evangelist minister in this church, (Piscataway,) has been appointed a missionary and agent by the Executive Committee of the Missionary Society, to travel and preach the gospel and collect funds for the benefit of the Society, that the gospel may be sent to the destitute churches, and settlements where our brethren may be located. His journey and labors will be through New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Rensselaer county, &c., and as his mission is one of great moment, he hopes that as the time allotted him is short, that the people will be in readiness when he comes among them, to assist him in his noble enterprize—especially the ministers, that he may accomplish much in a short time, and that his efforts may bring a new era among us upon the subject of missions. And as Mr. Griswold is a stranger in the denomination, we would say, that we think him fully competent for the duty assigned him, and hope that he will receive that hearty reception with ministers and people where he may travel that his station and calling demands.

☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practisal school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post-paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES'

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

CAPITAL,

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!

Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.

CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840, COMBINING

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE

SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real esatate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon, exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $800,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

Commissioners:

Edward Rogers,
A. C. H. Smith,
Baron S. Doty,
Cornelius Masten,
Platt Adams,
M. Ogden,
E. G. Merrick,
Elias Goodspeed,
Calvin K. Averill,
Benjamin Balch.

Any communication relative to the business of this company, made in New York city, if addressed to BENJAMIN BALCH, will receive prompt attention. 50t1m

Agencies of this company will be appointed in such states as may wish to secure them; but only upon an interest being first taken in the stock.

50 PIECES BROAD CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, SATINETTES, at reduced prices at the NEW YORK CASH STORE.

POETRY.

From the Youth's Cabinet.

The Slave Mother to her Sleeping Babe.

My sleeping babe, thy ebon brow
To me is fair as if 'twas white;
Thy ruby lips is curling now
With some sweet vision of delight—
Thy mother joys to see thee smile
While slumbering thus, my darling child.

Ah! sweetly sleep—for soon the cry
Thou too wilt hear, "Up sluggard, start!"
And at the task no pitying eye
Will kindly cheer thy aching heart;
From morn till eve thou'lt toil in gloom,
There is no respit but the tomb!

Sleep, sleep, my boy! the future, dark,
Unfolds its terrors, one by one,
To my torn bosom—hark, oh hark!
The scourge! that shriek! it is my son!
Glad would I lay thee in the grave,
My babe, for thou art born a slave.

GREENOUGH'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON.

BY GILES F. YATES.

"See! what a grace is seated on that brow;
Hyperion's curls, the front of Jove himself;
An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
A station like the herald Mercury
New lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.
A combination and a form indeed,
Where every God did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man!"

Almost every person who claims to be a critic, forms for himself a "beau ideal," a standard of perfection, to which every work of art submitted to his examination must conform, or it fails to secure his approbation. If he does not apply the Procrustean process in its fullest extent, he finds it difficult to guard altogether against prepossessions, or to prevent them from influencing his decisions in a greater or less degree. In a similar predicament I found myself when I first saw Greenough's statue of Washington. In common with the hundreds who came to view it, my first impressions were decidedly unfavorable. It was only on repeating my visits that my prejudices wore away, and its many beauties began to be unfolded to my view. It may be, moreover, that several high-wrought encomiums which I had seen in the public prints, had raised my expectations in the first instance to an undue pitch. How often under similar circumstances, is one doomed to disappointment!

The statue is placed on a plain pedestal near the centre of the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington. It is about twice the size of life; and like the Jupiter of Phidias, is seated on a chair. The back of the chair is embellished with antique open work, having at one corner a small statue of Columbus, and at the other an American Aboriginal. The sides of the chair are carved in bas-relief with symbolical representations of North and South America. A sentorial robe, gracefully resting on the right arm of the statue, falls over the lower part of the body, and leaves the rest of the figure in a state of nudity. It has Roman sandals on the feet, and a Roman sword in the left hand, not grasped for action, but resting on the palm of the hand, with the handle turned from the body. The right hand is raised, and its index points to Heaven.

In front of the chair, on either side, are carved the head and claws of a lion. Some think that the head and claws of an Eagle would have been more American, and therefore a more appropriate ornament. But to quarrel with Greenough on this account, would be hypercritical. The other designs and devices on the chair are truly well chosen, and there is a peculiar fitness of all the parts to the grand whole, which reflects high credit on the taste and talent of the distinguished designer. Yet as a general rule, ornaments such as these should be held of comparatively small account when judging of a work of art like the one under consideration. They are only accessories to the principal design, and like back ground of a portrait serve, in some measure, to heighten or diminish the effect of the portrait, but add nothing to its correctness or intrinsic excellence.

In regard to the costume adopted by Greenough, critics have been serve in their censures. Whoever feels disposed to join them, will, I think, be diverted from his purpose on examining the bronze statue of Jefferson, still remaining in the Rotunda. This, as is well known, is attired in the ungainly dress of the last century. On viewing it for the first time, I could not help being impressed with the idea that the spirit of ultraism prevades the ranks of artists as well as politicians. In its place and on proper occasions it is not only proper, but it becomes imperative on an artist to make a faithful copy of the outward gear worn at a particular period. But every person who candidly considers what should be the characteristics of such a work as the one Greenough was commissioned to perform, will hesitate in coming to the conclusion that he was required to perpetuate the dress which capricious fashion prescribed during the last century, or to illustrate the ironical adage that the tailor and hair-dresser make the man. Man is the most beautiful and perfect of all earthly beings. There is a manliness and grace, and above all an expression, in the human form and limbs, which the apparel, so far from improving, actually hides and deforms. I allude not so much to physical beauty, (for it was not an Apollo our artist was required to represent,) as to intellectual and moral beauty. In this connection it may be observed, in regard to Chantry's Washington, that whatever its defects may be, he has, in regard to costume, endeavored to observe such a proper medium as to offend neither the sticklers for historical imitation on the one hand, nor yet the advocates for what is termed classical taste on the other.

There undoubtedly is such a thing as sacrificing historical truth and accuracy to classical taste. Witness the painting of the British artist, (his name I cannot call to mind,) who to avoid the one extreme of representing the soldiers of General Wolfe, at the seige of Quebec, in their swan-tailed coats, with big buttons, fell into the opposite extreme, of depicting them all nearly naked, and with bows and arrows instead of swords and blunderbusses. Now it is contended, that to some extent, at least, Greenough has not been sufficiently regardful of historic truth. How far this may be true, is a delicate question, and one which it would take too long to discuss. It must, however, be especially noted, that Geenough had authority for his conduct which the British painter had not. The latter was required to represent a single insolated event, but the former a general history in one view, of the Father of his country,—a concentrated embodiment of all his virtues as a christian, statesman and hero. The poet's license then was his! That this justified him in selecting the costume of the classic Romans, I dare not dispute. The sword and toga aptly and beautifully depict to the mind his blended character as a warrior and counsellor of state. Many things that relate to classical taste, cannot be fully understood or appreciated by any except those who belong to the society of the Virtuosi. The uninitiated, though possessed of sound judgment and good common sense on matters in general, cannot reconcile these things to their ideas of propriety. They require more of the plain "matter of fact" to suit their peculiar notions.

There was one act of the venerated Friend and Father of his Country, which has more of the moral sublime in it than any other in his history, or in that of any military hero on record. It will at once be known, that I refer to that particular period in his life, when, with a whole army at his command, and to whom his will was law, he indignantly refused the overtures of some of his officers, to proclaim himself Dictator of this Republic. This event undoubtedly occurred to Greenough, when his genius conceived this statue. When I first saw it, my mind, adverting to and dwelling upon this sublime event, experienced a feeling of disappointment on not finding that some more direct allusion had been made to it; as for example, by a spurned or trampled crown or sceptre. But this could only have been done at the expense of making the statue more allegorical than it now is, and would doubtless have detracted from that dignified simplicity which is one of its chief beauties.

Different constructions have been put upon the meaning of the gesture and attitude which the statue is made to assume. The impression produced at first blush, is that while with one hand Washington resigns his sword, he with the other points to heaven, as if directing the American people to the all-wise and all-powerful Ruler of Nations for protection and support. But this is taking too contracted a view of the subject. We see in the manner in which the sword is held, either a willingness to give up the weapon of war, if no longer necessary, or to use it, if again necessary, in defence of the rights and liberties of his country. By the uplifted hand may be indicated his appeal to Heaven for the rectitude of his intentions, and a firm reliance on Divine Providence for the success of his own undertakings as a military and civil ruler, and for his beloved country's welfare in peace or war.

Said a captious critic, a few days ago, in my hearing, "Washington is made to assume too lazy a posture." Had the artist designed to throw into the figure, motive energy or martial fire, to the entire exclusion of the milder virtues for which his "subject" was distinguished, he would not have selected, as he has, the sitting posture: an equestrian statue would have answered his purpose better. A standing figure would have been more natural and appropriate, if the design had been to commemorate any one particular act of Washington, such as the resignation of his military command. But as the sculptor in his design was not thus circumscribed, he selected the attitude and gestures which the figure is made to assume, as more suitable for the ends he had in view. He intended, not to represent Washington at any one period of his life, as I have before taken occasion to remark, nor to make his statue in the literal or ordinary sense of the term, but to give a grand poetical conception, a corporeal representation of his whole life and character. To place him, who was at once the statesman, warrior, patriot and christian, in the sentorial chair, having been decided on, all concomitant circumstances necessary to be portrayed, had to be subdued "in keeping" with the grand design, and to be made to blend with it in one entire harmony.

The expression of benignity, calmness and resignation which the statue exhibits, and which is perhaps heightened by the attitude, has been mistaken for supineness, and the want of proper force of character. But how admirable and characteristic of the Mount Vernon philanthropist, hero and sage, is that repose, mildness and good will, united with dignity and decision, which the countenance and attitude indicate.

The gigantic size of the statue has been urged as an objection; the tenability of which let us examine. The practice of the Chinese painters to enlarge the heads of their great men, while their bodies are left of the natural size, though it might perhaps be justified by some modern professor of phrenology, is at variance with every just notion of the suitable and beautiful in "proportion." Ideas of greatness are always associated with quantity. Therefore under certain restrictions, the magnitude of a painted or carved figure is deemed the sign of mental as well as physical greatness.—The largeness of the figure gains for it nobleness of effect, and imparts to it a dignity and grandeur not otherwise attainable. This position, as a general rule, cannot be gainsayed, and is in fact universally acknowledged. Would not then Greenough have been guilty of an unpardonable blunder, had he made his Washington no larger than life?

In accordance with the principle above laid down, a Jupiter and a Hercules ought alike to be depicted in size above the common standard of mortals. But the character of the two being different, this difference must be expressed by different proportions of the several parts, so as to produce in the one manly strength combined with grace, and in the other, manly strength excessive. A student in anatomy remarked that the legs, arms and thighs of Greenough's statue are too long for its other parts. I do not profess to be skilled in anatomy, but I am well satisfied that the student was mistaken. I cannot discover any thing like a dangling appearance to the arms. If any part of the figure is disproportioned, it is the part between the hips and knees. I speak, of course, without authority, but venture to assert, that the legs and thighs, if disproportionately long and large, are made so intentionally. By this means, a superhuman appearance is given to the statue. It is so with the celebrated statue of the Apollo belviders, which Greenough may have adopted as his model. If it be asked how can so grand an effect be gained by a seeming deformity, the best answer is, that such is the fact proved by ocular demonstration. A similar enlargement or extension applied to any other part of the human frame, would fail to produce this effect. Enlarge the head and it will appear heavy or stupid; the neck in length, and it will seem too effeminate—in breadth, too Herculean. Enlarged arms will appear too Vulcanlike; and extend the disproportionate enlargement to the body, the hands, and the lower part of the legs or feet, and they will appear clumsy and ungraceful.

Certain muscles about the arms, neck and breast, although not out of due proportion with the body, appear too prominent for beauty. This would doubtless be remedied, were the statue placed at a greater distance from the spectator's eye. I am led here to remark, that the main cause why the statue is unpopular, is to be found in the fact, that its bulk and proportions illy correspond with the place it occupies, and (speaking particularly with reference to its first location) do not come within the strict rules of fitness and propriety. As before intimated, it is absurd to suppose that the comparative bulk of a statue, or that its bulk in the abstract, furnishes a true measure of the degree of greatness intended to be conveyed to the mind. Its size is of course to be regulated by the distance from which it is to be viewed, or by its destined position; whether on the top of a high or low column—in the open air, or within the walls of a building—on the floor of a room—in a niche on the same level with the floor, or in the niche of a room at any given point of elevation. The statue in question is rather too gigantic for the architecture of the Rotunda, or is not in harmony with its dimensions, and too high to be viewed with satisfaction in all its parts, from the most suitable point of vision that can possibly be selected. When the statue was placed in the centre of the Rotunda, with the light falling directly upon it, the objections to its location above alluded to, especially the last, were of more force than at present. That its original location was not the most proper, was a matter of such universal comment, that a committee was appointed by Congress to inquire into the expediency of having it removed to a more suitable part of the Rotunda. A few days ago this was accomplished. It has been lowered about three feet, and now occupies a place between the centre of the Rotunda and its western entrance. Its present location and height is in exact accordance with Greenough's express request and advice, which was altogether disregarded in the first instance.

In its workmanship, or what is technically termed its "execution," I hesitate not to pronounce this statue of Greenough a master piece. The touches of his chisel are most exquisite, and exhibit a blended boldness and delicacy, which constitute the perfection of art.

Waiving all minor and venial objections before adverted to as to the design, or in other words as to the manner in which Greenough has treated his subject, there is only one objection which I deem of any weight. It is not sufficiently American. It has not sufficient allusion to the particular period in which Washington flourished and became immortal—to those eventful times, quorum magna pars fait! It is not for me to say how this should be done. To be able to suggest how it could be done, would imply inventive genius, to which I make no pretensions. I only wish to convey the idea, that to my humble apprehension, a statue of Washington should have something more than the mere likeness, the mere prosopological indications of his physical and mental qualities to designate the man. The marble should be made, in a marked & unquestionable manner, to tell the history of the Hero of the AMERICAN revolution!

Schenectady, March, 1842.

FIFTEEN MINUTES TO SPARE.

In passing from one engagement to another, during the day, there are often small portions of time for which many make no special provision, and so lose them entirely. A good economist, however, of time, which is money, and to many their only capital, will always have something to fill up these spaces. Put together they make days and months and years, and are worth saving. Some persons are so constituted, that it is next to impossible for them to be systematic, methodical, and steadily and continuously diligent. They can work only by fits and starts; and they work best when the spirit moves them, compensating, by the earnestness and energy with which they labor, for the seasons during which they loaf or lounge. Such gentlemen of genius are, however, rare; a great many lazy fellows, who imagine themselves members of this class, having, in fact, no right to be ranked with them, and deserving to be talked to first for their idleness, and secondly for their impudence in trying to excuse their drone like propensities, by pretending to be like the few excentric great men, who are, in respect to the way in which they do things, a law unto themselves. Most people, to accomplish any thing, need to be constantly industrious; and for them, it is wiser never to have "fifteen minutes to spare," and always to have some little matter to which they can turn their hand. A certain mathematician, we forget who, is said to have composed an elaborate work, when visiting with his wife, during the interval of time between the moment when she first started to take leave of their friends, and the moment she had fairly finished her last words. We heard once of a young man, eager for knowledge, who read the whole of Hume's History of England whilst waiting, at his boarding house, for his meals to be served. No excuse is more common for ignorance, than a want of time to learn; and no excuse is more frequently false. Unconsciously one may get engrossed in business and entangled with engagements, so that he cannot well release himself and escape. But it is bad to do this; and against it one should be on his guard. In many cases, however, such entire occupation of time is not the fact; it is only imagined to be the fact. Every body, every day, waste moments if not hours, which might be devoted to useful ends. "Where there is a will, there is always a way," says the proverb. A systematic arrangement of business, habits of rigid punctuality, and a determination to gather up the fragments, will enable a man to make wonderful additions to his stock of knowledge. The small stones which fill up the crevices have almost as much to do with making the fair and firm wall as the great rocks; so the right and wise use of spare moments contributes not a little to the building up in good proportions and with strength a man's mind. Because we are merchants and mechanics, we need not be ignorant of all that lies without the boundaries of the counting-room or the shop. Because the good woman looketh well to her household, she need not abstain entirely from looking into books. If to make money, or get a dinner, the mind must be entirely neglected, it were better to be poor and starve. But there is no such necessity as this, as any one may discover, who will with justfiable avarice make good use of every "fifteen minutes he has to spare."—Newburyport Herald.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough. Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

One of the best medicines for common colds In fluenzas &c. &c. &c., to be found in the whole catalogue of patent medicines. Give it a try, it is first rate, call and read one of his circulars.

Historical Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion.

LECTURE III.—THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY G. M. LANGWORTHY.

(CONCLUDED.)

These observations and testimonies of infidels, may perhaps prepare our minds for a reception of a fuller and more connected account of the sufferings of the early christians, which is contained in our own books, and which may be summed up as follows, viz: "That the founder of christianity, from the commencement of his ministery to the time of his violent death, employed himself wholly in preaching the gospel in Judea and Galilee; that in order to assist him in this purpose, he made choice out of the number of his followers, of twelve persons who might accompany him as he traveled from place to place; that except on a short journey to announce his mission, and a few days spent at Jerusalem, these persons were his constant attendants, that they were with him at Jerusalem when he was apprehended and put to death, that they were commissioned by him when his ministry ceased, to published his gospel and make prosolytes to it in all the world. That a few days after his departure, these persons, with some of his relations assembled at Jerusalem; where they elected a person to fill the place of Judas who had betrayed his trust and and fell, that they made this selection from those who had been with Christ from the beginning of his mission, in order that he might be a competent witness of the things which they affirmed of Christ; that they first began at Jerusalem to preach faith and baptism for remission of sins, that many accepted the proposals, and formed themselves into a society. That the attention of the Jewish government being soon directed against them, two of the twelve, very intimate with Christ when he was alive, were seized as they were discoursing to the people in the temple, and after being kept all night in prison, they were brought the next day before an assembly, of the chief persons of the government, who after examining them, found no cause of death in them, and therefore after forbidding them to speak any more in this name, let them go. That a very short time after this, the twelve were seized and cast into prison, and being brought a second time before the Jewish Sanhedrim, they were upbraided with their disobedience to the injunction laid upon them, and beaten for their contumacy; that being charged once more to desist, they were suffered to depart, though they neither quitted Jerusalem, nor ceased to preach in the temple, and from house to house.

Hitherto the preachers of christianity had the common people in their favor, and this was the reason of the clemency of the Jews on the occasion which I have mentioned.—Very soon, however, they were persuaded that this new religion opposed their laws, and easily were they then induced to join with their superiors in stoning a very active member of this community. The death of this man was the signal of a general persecution, which raged at Jerusalem with so much fury as to drive most of the new converts out of the place, who nevertheless preached Christ wherever they went. The persecution followed them to the cities, in which the authority of the Jewish Sanhedrim was allowed to be exercised over Jews. A young man, who had signalised himself by his hostility to the profession, and had procured a commission from the council at Jerusalem to seize any converted Jews whom he might find at Damascus, suddenly became a proselyte to the religion which he was going about to extirpate.

This man now brought down upon his own head a double measure of enmity from the Jews, who watched the gates of Damascus night and day, with so much diligence that he escaped from their hands, only by being let down in a basket by the wall. Nor did he find greater security in Jerusalem, to which he immediately fled.

Attempts were there soon made to destroy him, and his life was saved by being sent to Cilicia his native country. About this time there was a cessation of seven or eight years to this persecution, and within this period churches were formed in all Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, by the activity of the apostles and their associates. Those who had been expelled from Jerusalem during the persecution, traveled as far as Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch, and all returned again to Jerusalem as their general rendezvous.

Herod Agrippa soon stretched forth his hand to vexcertain of the church, he beheaded one of the twelve, and seeing that the Jews were pleased with it, he seized another in order to put him to death, but this man was miraculously delivered from his hand and made his escape from Jerusalem.

Paul and Barnabas, about this time, started on their journey through Asia Minor, and at almost every place where they stopped, they were insulted and their lives endangered. After being expelled from Antioch, they went to Iconium, where an attempt was made to stone them. They fled to Lystra, where one of them was stoned and drawn out of the city for dead. These two men, tho' not original apostles were acting in connection with them, for after completing their journey, being sent on a mission to Jerusalem, they there related to the apostles and elders, the events and success of their ministry, and were, in return, recommended by them to the churches as men who had hazarded their lives in the cause.

Paul now crosses, for the first time the Ægean Sea, and carries with him our historian. They stop at Philippi where Paul and one of his companions, are cruelly whipped, cast into prison, and then kept under the most rigorous custody, being thrust while yet smarting with their wounds, into the inner dungeon and their feet made fast in the stocks. They afterwards were dismissed and went to Thessalonica, where the house in which they were, was attacked by a party of their enemies, in order to bring them out to the populace. But this indefatigable minister finally pushed his way thro' Athens, Corinth, and Ephesus, again to Jerusalem. He soon, however, left this city for Antioch, and this again for Ephesus; here he preached two years, when his success excited the apprehensions of those who were interested in support of the national worship. Their clamor produced a tumult, in which he nearly lost his life.

He then retired to Greece, and stationed himself at Corinth. Afterwards, when he wished to return to Syria, by a direct course, he was prevented by the Jews, and forced to retrace his steps through Macedonia to Philippi, and thence to take shipping to Asia. Along the coast he pursued his voyage with all possible expedition, in order to reach Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost. Here the populace seized him in the temple; forced him out of it, and would have destroyed him, had not the Roman guard interfered, and in great mercy began to examine him by torture.

From this time to the conclusion of the history, the apostle remains in public custody of the Roman government. After escaping assassination, and delivering himself from the power of his enemies by an appeal to Cæsar, he was sent after two years imprisonment to Rome. Here he continued to preach the gospel in his own hired house, to all who came unto him, notwithstanding he was a prisoner and his life contingent. This is substantially the account given in our own books of the progress and persecution of the early christians; and without stopping to notice the various corroborating passages which might be drawn from the same source, I will conclude this article with submitting the testimony of the following witnesses:

Clement says, "let us take the example of our own age. Though zeal and envy, the most faithful and righteous pillars of the church, have been persecuted even to the most grievous deaths, let us set before our eyes the holy apostles. Peter, by unjust envy, underwent, not one or two, but many suffering; till at last, being martyred he went to the place of glory that was due unto him.—For the same cause did Paul, in like manner, receive the reward of his patience. Seven times he was in bonds; he was whipped; was stoned; he preached both in the east and in the west, leaving behind him the glorious report of his faith, and so having taught the whole world righteousness, and for that end traveled even unto the utmost bounds of the west, he at last suffered martyrdom, by the command of the governors, and departed out of the world, and went unto his holy place; being become a most eminent pattern of patience unto all ages. To these holy apostles were joined a very great number of others, who, having through envy undergone, in like manner, many pains and torments, have left a glorious example to us.—For this, not only men but women have been persecuted, and having suffered very grievous and cruel punishments, have finished the course of their faith with firmness."

Hermas, saluted by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, in a piece very little connected with history, says, "Such as have believed and suffered death for the name of Christ, and have endured with a ready mind, and have given up their lives with all their hearts."

Polycarp says, "I exhort all of you that ye obey the words of righteousness, and exercise all patience, which ye have seen set forth before your eyes, not only in the blessed Ignatius, and Lorimus and Rufus, but in others among yourselves, and in Paul himself and the rest of the apostles; being confident in this, that all these have not run in vain, but in faith and righteousness; and are gone to the place that was due to them from the Lord, with whom also they suffered. For they loved not this present world, but him who died, and was raised again by God for us."

Ignatius, the contemporary of Polycarp testifies to the same when he says, "For this cause (having felt and handled Christ's body after his resurrection, and being convinced both by flesh and spirit,) they (Peter and those with him at Christ's appearance,) despised death, and were found to be above it."

The Church of Smyrna, in a circular entitled "the relation of Polycarp's martyrdom," say, "The sufferings of all the other martyrs were blessed and generous, which they underwent according to the will of God. For so it becomes us, who are more religious than others, to ascribe the power and ordering of all things unto him. And, indeed, who can choose but admire the greatness of their minds, and that admirable patience and love of their master, which then appeared in them? who, when they were so flayed with whipping, that the frame and structure of their bodies were laid open to their very inward veins and arteries, nevertheless endured it? In like manner those who were condemned to the beasts, and kept a long time in prison; underwent many cruel torments; being forced to lie upon sharp spikes laid under their bodies, and tormented with divers other sorts of punishments; that so, if it were possible, the tyrants by the length of their sufferings, might have bro't them to deny Christ."

Lastly, I am to mention the coincidence of the christian writers of the New Testament.

When different historians relate the affairs of the same period; the one either derives his information from the other, or else both write from actual knowledge of their own. And it is an easy matter to distinguish an original historian from the copyist as there is an independence in the style and manner of one, which cannot be imitated by the other.

It is not possible that an event, or a series of events should make such an impression on two different men as to dispose them to relate it in the same words. The fact is each man tells the thing in his own way, and one often mentions things which the other has either forgotten, or does not think it necessary to his purpose to relate.

It is this agreement in the facts, with this variety in the manner of narrating them, that impresses upon the mind, a conviction of the truth of what the different witnesses relate.

I hardly need to say, that this is the very kind of coincidence which subsists between the writers of the New Testament, as every one who has paid the least attention to this subject knows it is the fact. When the difference between two historians amounts to a contradiction, it enfeebles the testimony of both. When the agreement is too close and minute, it destroys the credit of one party as being independent. In the case before us there is neither that agreement, nor that disagreement. Such, indeed, are the variations, that, at first sight, the reader is uneasy from apprehensions of contradiction; but such is the actual coincidence that all our fears vanish the moment we apply to them the labors of a profound and intelligent criticism, and we are constrained to acknowledge, whether we will or not, that the testimony of such men, or rather that such testimony must be true.

ENCOURAGE LAY LABORERS.

1. He is the best agent in any business who can set at work and supervise the greatest number of subordinate agents in the same general cause.

2. The ministry are too few, and the work too great for them ever alone to achieve the salvation of the world. They must have aid or the work will not be done.

3. Now it is not enough that parents, masters, Sabbath school teachers, church officers, magistrates, &c., each in their appropriate sphere, do what they can. The minister needs the co-operation of the whole church in his onset upon a stupid, wicked and ruined world. He should endeavor to marshal the whole fraternity of the faithful as "the host of God," in the enterprize of holy and benevolent exertion.

4. May there not be departments of labor in which, sooner or later, and occasionally, every member of the church may and should be engaged.

5. Should not every member of the church feel that, to do something in the world to promote the temporal and eternal well being of his fellow creatures, is a duty inseparable from his relation to the world, and inseparable from the very spirit of his Christian profession.

6. Is it not evident that the cultivation of this sort of personal individual enterprize, and of this living and conscious connection with the church, is the true way to remedy the evils which we as pastors complain of, viz: coldness, worldly absorption, hardness of heart, a feeling of irresponsibleness, and virtual apostacy in the church. Can it ever be that the business of prayer, praise, reading the Scriptures, social Christian conference, however truly and largely they are contributory to the life of the members of the church, will ever be found sufficient to mature that life. And unless the members of the church can be engaged in something beyond the sphere of personal interests, affections and employments, will not the mind stagnate in dull uniformity or corrupt in selfishness. Does not the great law of life that pervades the physical, pervade also the moral man, viz: that healthful action of the human system must be impelled by that which is without, as well as by that which is within: that the blood, for example, should move, not only by the force of internal laws, but that its circulation should be assisted by external appliances also, such as air, friction and exercise.

THE FEMALE PRAYER-MEETING.

In a western village, long before the blessings of a stated ministry were enjoyed, a few professors of religion were accustomed to meet for the worship of God. The time passed on, new members were added by immigration, and some of the earlier ones were gathered to the tomb.—The children became men and women, and verged more and more towards the end of life, and still the moral aspect of the place was like the heath in the desert.

In this state of things there were a few, and but a few, who did not quite lose the savor of a living piety. Among others were four wives and mothers, who, without other stimulus than their own feelings, (for it is doubtful whether they had ever heard of a female prayer-meeting,) agreed to meet and plead the promises of God, and wrestle with the Angel of the Covenant in behalf of their families. Of their numerous children, some nearly of adult age, not one was then pious. The engagement was faithfully kept. Through summer's heat and winter's cold, those faithful mothers might have been seen wending their way to the place appointed, and there they mingled their tears and prayers before the mercy seat. Afflictions attended all those families; although one was wealthy, and others were poor, they felt themselves to be, as they really were, alike in need of the support of divine grace. O none can know, save those who know by experience, what fervent, sisterly love, grew up between those women!

Years rolled on ere the bread of life was broken to that community by a pastor. Still, amid all discouragements, these females remained faithful. They labored and had patience, and did not faint. And what was the result?

It cannot be told till the day of the revelation of all things, how far their prayers were instrumental in the organization of a church, and the settlement of a minister, and the establishment of all those stated means of blessing which follow in its train; but it may be told, even now, that great good resulted to all their numerous children, few remain out of Christ. One after another they came to the Savior, and found pardon. One of those mothers rejoices over the hopeful conversion of all her surviving children, ten in number, one of whom has been for years preaching the Gospel to the heathen, another is yet looking forward to the ministry, while the rest, in other relations, are found among the active advocates of all things that are lovely and of good report. And in the other families, similar blessings in kind, if not in degree, have also been enjoyed. And all this is traced to the watching of these good women "unto prayer, with all perseverance."

PURE FROM THE BLOOD OF ALL MEN.

An apostle stood up before the elders of the church, and said, "I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men." His must have been a conscience void of offense, or he would not have ventured to challenge the witnesses of his ministry to convict him of deficiency in duty. They must have been conscious of his fidelity, or they would have charged him with blood-guiltiness when he sought to clear himself.

Who can take the apostle's words, and with his hand on his heart, and with the fear of God on his soul, say in sincerity and truth—"I am pure from the blood of all men."

All are not apostles. All are not pastors and teachers. But all are stewards. To some have been committed more, and to others less; and each man in the moral government of God has a responsibility in the blood of his fellow-men. The man does not live in human society whose circle of influence surrounds himself alone. His own family, his neighbors, his friends, his enemies, the world itself may be effected by his conduct for good or for evil, and though like Cain, he may seek to deny the relationship. God has made him his brother's keeper, and will hold him to his trust.

Often does this responsibility rest with peculiar force on the pastor's heart. There are those around him, who, to all human appearances, will be effected for eternity by the fidelity of his ministry. He is set to watch for their souls. If the watchman obey the voice of the Lord, and faithfully warn the wicked of their way, and the wicked persist in sin and perish in their iniquity, the watchman has delivered his soul. "Their blood," saith God, "I will not require at thy hand." But his unfaithfulness in sounding the alarm in Zion, may cause the ruin of those over whom he is set, and their blood the Lord hath said, he will require of the watchman. How sweetly must that pastor sleep, who can lie down after a Sabbath's labors, with the strong consciousness that he has acquitted himself in the fear of the Lord, so that if he passes to the judgment before he awakes, the blood of souls cannot be found in his skirts. Men who labor and pray with the determination thus to be found when the Son of Man cometh, will be blessed as they toil, and have the joy of seeing the work of God prospering in their hands. Or if they see no present fruit; if their faithful services seem to exert no reforming or restraining power on those around them, they still have the assurance that the holy purpose of God will be accomplished, and their own souls will be pure in the day of the Lord.

The same precious consolation comes to the hearts of parents who mourn the continued impenitence of their children.—Those children may perish, and their blood may be required at their parents' hands.—It will be, if in the day of judgment it shall appear that those children perished through parental unfaithfulness. And those have rich comfort when they stand by the graves of their offspring, who can assure themselves that they have left no means untried to win their souls to Christ, and have thus fulfilled their covenant obligations to train their children in the service of God. Or, when a parent is called to die with his children around him, it will help to make death sweet to know that he is pure from their blood. And when he meets them at the bar of God, though he meets to part with them forever, it will be precious to reflect that he as a father delivered his soul from the guilt of his children's ruin.

Christians, private christians may not be pure from the blood of men. Few are.—The world around them is perishing in sin, and have they done their whole duty for its salvation? Have they with all fidelity sought the conversion of their impenitent neighbors and friends? Have they prayed without ceasing, and with anxious faith that the Holy Spirit might descend upon the church to which they belong? Do they live such blameless and godly lives, as to command by the silent power of a holy example the religion of Christ to an ungodly world? And is their influence given so decidedly in favor of all that is good, that they are sure no one is pleading their conduct as an excuse for continuance in sin. Unreasonable, and wicked, and vain as such an excuse may be, it is often urged, and has its power on the hearts of unconverted men, who may perish under its influence, leaving a load of guilt on the soul of him over whose imperfections they stumbled into hell.

Every moral enterprise with which the future happiness of the human race is linked, demands the aid of all good men, and he is not guiltless who stands aloof, although he may not oppose. Take the cause of missions, as an enterprise for the spread of the gospel over a sin-covered earth. If the heathen will perish without the gospel, it is duty to send them the gospel. If we have not done our duty in sending them the gospel, we are not pure from their blood. But the most of men think they do right if they give, but do not think that they do wrong if they withhold. They act on the principle that all they have is their own, and no moral obligation binds them to bestow their property for the conversion of distant pagans. But if those are dying in sin who might be delivered if they heard of a Savior, how can he be held guiltless who has the ability to send them that knowledge, and yet refuse to do it?—Such a man cannot lay his hand on his heart and say, "I am pure from blood." The blood of millions lies at his door; stains in his skirts; pollutes his heart. Oh! what blood can wash it away!

And the same is true of all other means which God has appointed for the salvation of men. If they are to be set in operation by human instrumentality, each man must do his duty, his whole duty, or bear the reproach of unfaithfulness, and the blood of the perishing will be required at his hands.

PARENTAL CHARACTER OF GOD.

It must be remembered that we have not the slightest claim upon God, as a matter of right, for any one good thing that we ask or desire to have. The veriest criminal soliciting a reprieve has not less claim on the score of right, than we have. All that we want may, in fact, be comprised in one word—Mercy; and mercy necessarily implies the entire absence of all right. A man has always a right to justice, but he never can have a right to mercy. It is a contradiction in terms to talk of deserving mercy; and we must first get rid of this too common idea, in our conceptions of the Deity, and in our contemplations of the Divine dealings, before we can rightly understand the true relation between sinful man and his offended Father and God.—We must be ready and willing to come to him as suppliants, not as claimants, if we hope to prevail with him. * * *

For, consider in what relation we stand to God; by nature, very far gone from original righteousness, by practice, continually adding to our load of actual sin, and widening the distance which separates us from God. And this it is which constitutes our wretched moral and spiritual condition; for it is utterly impossible, in the very nature of things, that there can be any true happiness for man, while alienated from his Creator. As well might we expect the earth to be blessed with genial warmth, or to glow with cheerful light, if the sun were blotted from the heavens, as that man can be happy at a distance from God, the source of all happiness, the fountain of all enjoyment. And the benevolent object of all God's dealings with men is, to reconcile and bring them near to himself, to reclaim them from the wanderings to which they are so prone, to lead them back, with a firm, though gentle hand, to the fold whence they have strayed, to "deliver them from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." (Rom. viii. 21.)

In both these respects, then, the entire absence of any just claim to favor on our part, and the immensity of the boon which God offers, he has an unquestionable right, upon every principle of reason and equity, to choose his own method for man's redemption. He might justly have made the offer, if he made it at all, on some severe conditions, hard to be performed, even conveyed to us in the language of indignation, and accompanied by the frowns of offended Omnipotence. It would have been no impeachment of his equity, had it pleased him to propose some measure for this purpose, calculated to alarm us by an aspect of terror, without any mixture of love discernible, to temper the severity of his righteous judgment. But what is the fact? What is really God's appointed method of man's salvation? And in what language communicated? Let prophets and Apostles, and the Savior himself, furnish the reply in language dictated by the Spirit of truth."—Sir Edward Parry.

STRANGENESS OF DEATH.—Angels have no death to undergo; there is no such fear of unnatural violence between them and their final destiny. It is for man, and, for aught that appears, it is for man alone, to watch from the other side of the material panorama that surrounds him, the great and amazing realities with which he has everlastingly to do—it is for him, so locked in an imprisonment of clay, and with no other loop-holes of communication between himself and all that surrounds him, than the eye and the ear—it is for him to light up in his bosom a lively and a realizing sense of the things that the eye hath never seen, and the ear hath never heard! It is for man, and perhaps for man alone, to travel it through over the ruins of a mighty desolation, and beyond the wreck of that present world by which he is encompassed, to conceive that future world on which he is to expatiate for ever. But a harder achievement, perhaps, than any—it is for a man in the exercise of faith, to observe that most appalling of all contemplations, the decay and dissolution of himself; to think of the time when his new animated frame-work, every part of which is so sensitive and dear to him, shall fall to pieces—when the vital warmth by which it is so thoroughly pervaded shall take its departure, and leave to coldness and abandonment all that is visible of this moving, and thinking creature; when those limbs, with which he now steps so firmly, and that countenance, out of which he looks so gracefully, and that tongue, with which he now speaks so eloquently—when that whole body, for the interest and provision of which he now labors so strenuously, as if indeed it were immortal, when all these shall be reduced to a mass of putrefaction, and at length crumble with the coffin that encloses them, in the dust! Why, my brethren, to a being in the full consciousness and possession of its living energies, there is something, if I may be allowed the expression, so foreign and so unnatural in death, that we ought not to wonder if it scares away the mind from that etherial region of existence to which it is hastening. Angels have no such transition of horror and mystery to undergo.—There is no screen of darkness interposed between them and the portion of their futurity, however distant; and it appears that it is for man only to drive a bridge across that barrier which looks so impenetrable, or so to surmount the power of vision, as to carry his aspirings over the summits of all that revelation has made known to him. —Dr. Chalmers.

MAN'S DESTINY.—But man is higher than his dwelling place; he looks up and unfolds the wings of his soul, and when the sixty minutes which we call sixty years have passed, he takes flight, kindling as he rises, and the ashes of his feathers fall back to earth, and the unveiled soul, freed from its covering of clay, pure as an angel, ascends on high. Even in the midst of the dim shadows of life, he sees the mountains of the future world gilded with the morning rays of a sun which rises not here below.

So the inhabitants of polar regions look into the long night in which there is no sun-rise, but at midnight he sees a light like the first rosy rays of dawn, gleaming on the highest mountain top—and he thinks of the long summer in which it never sets.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, May 11, 1842.

"Sanctify them through thy Truth; thy Word is Truth."

How precious is the word of God. Job says, "I have esteemed the words of thy mouth more than my necessary food."—David says, "Thy word is very pure, therefore thy servant loveth it." An Apostle declares, that "All scripture is given by inspiration of God," &c., and that it "is able to make the man of God perfect," and thoroughly furnish him to every good work. In the language first quoted, the Savior prays for his disciples that they may be sanctified through the truth. In the word of God, then, we have the true "Philosopher's stone." He who loves the truth, shall be made free by it. It is a sure safeguard against all the ills that embitter life. It relieves from all sorrows, and bestows all good things. Nothing can make the child of God richer, happier, or more honorable. It is the sumum bonum—the chief good.

The chief excellence of the word of God consists in its sanctifying power.—To obtain this, an effort is required. God does not, by sovereign arbitrary power, subdue the heart and sanctify it. For this purpose he has ordained means, and placed them in the power of his subjects. In the word of God are these means found.—The first step, then, toward sanctification, on the part of the creature, is to search the scriptures and learn the mind of the Spirit. And the second and last step consists in submission thereto. These two things being yielded to secure the answer to the Savior's prayer. All other means are only subsidiary, and of themselves can effect nothing. That these two things are necessary to sanctification, is clear from the fact, that this cannot take place with the creature while he is in a state of transgression against God, and in order to do the will of God it must be known, and it must be searched out to be known. Hence none can lay a just claim to sanctification till he is perfect in obedience to the revealed will of God. Obedience to every requirement of the gospel is first necessary. If a man submit to only nine truths of all that is required, he is still a transgressor, consequently not in a state of sanctification. God's will must be fully done. The Savior says, "ye cannot serve God and mammon." As a corrupt fountain sends forth its poisonous streams, so does a corrupt heart that is not sanctified exhibit itself in transgression against God.

Sanctification is a progressive work.—It advances as knowledge and obedience progresses, and can never be perfect until the will of God is perfectly understood, and perfectly done. For this all are required to labor, though few may succeed in this life. The infirmities of the flesh, and external unholy influences may clog the soul through life, and prevent perfect obedience to God. But those who thus labor will not always be without their reward.—If they do not succeed in this life, while exposed on every hand, they will become holy when transferred to fairer climes beyond the reach of temptation, where this mortal shall put on immortality.

The primary meaning of sanctification is holiness, or freedom from the pollution and filth of sin, and from its power and dominion. For this object let every one who wishes salvation, zealously labor.

Suppression of Licentiousness.

A very able report was presented to the Assembly by Mr. Simmons, of the Judiciary Committee, on the suppression of Licentiousness, in answer to the prayer of some 40,000 petitioners. The report was accompanied by the following bill, which was not fully discussed and acted on:—

AN ACT TO PREVENT LICENTIOUSNESS.

The People of the State of New-York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SEC. 1. Every person who shall commit the crime of adultery, shall be punished by imprisonment in a State prison for a term not exceeding three years, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars; and when the crime shall be committed between a married woman and a man who is unmarried the man shall be deemed guilty of adultery, and be liable to be punished for that offence.

§ 2. If any man and woman, not being lawfully married to each other, shall, lewdly and lasciviously associate and cohabit together, every such person shall be punished by imprisonment in the State prison for not more than two years, or in county jail not more than two years, or by fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars.

§ 3. If any man shall so associate with any single woman, each of them shall be punished as follows, that is to say: the man shall be imprisoned in a State prison or county jail not exceeding two years, or fined not exceeding two hundred dollars; the woman confined in a State prison or county jail, or house of refuge established for the reformation of juvenile delinquents in the city of New York, for a term not exceeding two years, or a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars.

§ 4. Every person who shall inveigle, entice, or take away any female under the age of eighteen years from her father, mother, guardian or other person, with whom she may reside or be, for the purpose of prostitution or concubinage, and every person who shall aid, abet or assist therein, shall be punished by imprisonment in a State prison, not less than three, nor more than five years.

§ 5. Every person who shall keep a house of ill-fame, or assignation, resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness, shall be punished by imprisonment in a State prison not less than three, nor more than five years, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by both fine and imprisonment.

§ 6. Every person who shall lease or let any dwelling house or tenement, for the purpose of being kept as a house of ill-fame or bawdy house, or as a place of assignation, or for the purpose of prostitution, shall be punished by imprisonment in a State prison, or in county jail, for a term not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both, and shall, moreover, forfeit to the use of the poor of the city or county where such house or tenement shall be suitable, the rent, and profits of the same for five years next ensuing, to be recovered in ejectment by the overseers of such poor.

The friends of moral purity have much to encourage them in their efforts. More has already been accomplished than could reasonably be anticipated, when the tone of feeling long cherished by community is considered. It is a truth not to be disguised, that the shameless robber of virtue, of innocence, of character and happiness for life, has been cherished in societies professedly refined and moral, while the robber of a few pennies has been banished or incarcerated in prison. A darker, fouler stain does not rest on our country than this. Our Statute Book presents an entire want of consistency and perfection in affixing a penalty to crimes comparatively trivial, while it leaves the broad stream of pollution free to flow on destroying the dearest relations in life, and forever blasting the fondest hopes of parents, of brothers and sisters. The filching of one's property may be atoned for by process of law. But, how are those who are robbed of what is dearer than riches, or life, to seek redress? Alas, there is no redress! The arm of the law is not extended to guard innocence and virtue. It is no terror to the worst of evil-doers.

We suppose, by our remarks we may already have shocked the delicate feelings of some of our very fastidious readers.—But be it so. That delicacy which is so easily shocked is more in name than fact, and as false as the source from which it emanated, viz: the "Father of liars."—This sort of delicacy is one of the strongest bulwarks of the prowling libertine. What must be that delicacy that refuses to raise the voice for the protection of the affections and the security of virtue? While persons of such character may be left to reap the bitter fruits of such an unholy sentiment, those who have dared to contend against this foulest spirit of darkness, shall rejoice and receive the blessing promised the pure in heart.

The command of Jehovah has gone forth against Adultery and Licentiousness. This command is important and far-reaching, extending in its obligation to the thoughts of the heart, and in its influences to the peace of the domestic circle, and to the purity of heart of individuals. The christian's votive offering of himself to God, binds him to this command as it regards himself and his influences. It belongs to them, therefore, as they desire purity of heart in themselves, and others, to marshal themselves in array against this glaring sin. They are called upon to rejoice in the ground already gained, while they renew their efforts for the extirpation of impiety; and let them not be disheartened, "The time will come, however, when the anguish of betrayed innocence, the irremediable wounds of heart-broken relatives, of crushed, despairing families, the ills of a corrupted and desolate society, will not appeal for redress in vain, or be drowned by ruffian ribaldry, and the cant of demure lasciviousness.—May that day be hastened."

Sabbath Schools.

The Madison County Sabbath School Union held a meeting in this village last week. Owing to unavoidable circumstances but few were present. Mr. Smith, Agent of the Union, gave a succinct account of his labors in the county. The proportion of children that were members of Sabbath Schools the past year was very small. Mr. S. related some of the good effects of his labors and of S. Schools.—In view of which, the following sentiment was offered by Prof. J. H. Raymond.

Resolved, That in view of the success of efforts already made, we are called upon to render thanks to God, and take courage.

Mr. Smith will visit this town next week and lecture in the S. D. B. Church, on Sabbath, the 21st inst., and in the Baptist and Presbyterian Churches on first day, 22d inst. The friends of Sabbath Schools are earnestly desired to attend, and enter into arrangements for the promotion of the enterprize.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.—The Summer Term has just opened very favorably, with a larger number of scholars than any Summer Term for two years past.

Congressional News.

From the New-York Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, May 2, 1842.

Ratio of Representation—District System.

The Apportionment bill is not yet disposed of. The Committee of the Whole have, to my surprise, decided in favor of the very low ratio of one member to every 50,170 inhabitants. This gives Maine 10; New Hampshire 5; Vermont 5; Massachusetts 14; Connecticut 6; Rhode Island 2; New York 48; New Jersey 7; Pennsylvania 34; Ohio 30; Indiana 13; Illinois 9; Mississippi 7; Michigan 4 members. Giving the free States a majority of about 68, and making the whole House consist of 306 members. There will be one advantage in so numerous a body; it will be more difficult to make its members bow to the dictation of party or sectional interests than it now is. The House will probably confirm the ratio fixed by the Committee. The slave States, and the small free States are pleased to retain their absolute strength, though the loss of their relative numbers is a very sore subject to the former. Alas! those stern masters, the laws of national wealth and population, will never yield to the convenience or interests of those who live by plundering the poor of their hard earnings! For the last twenty years, the slave States, except in the free labor sections of them, and on new lands, have steadily declined in all the elements of power and greatness. More than one half the increase of white population in them since 1830, is in the single State of Missouri; consisting chiefly of free laborers from Germany, who hate slavery with an intense bitterness that will suffer no compromise with it, when they have become naturalized, and acquainted with their own political strength. The moral and social value of the German emigration to this country, I think, is not appreciated by many persons. A leading German gentleman at the West, formerly an officer in the Prussian army, told me, that in one settlement in Illinois there were more than fifty graduates of Universities and Gymnasia. These colonies, in frequent instances, have bro't their pastor, physician, and professional schoolmaster with them. Few of them are poor; many of them possess a good deal of wealth. A better informed, more industrious, and moral population, does not exist in the Great Valley. Such emigrants are an acquisition of great value to our country.

A proposition to compel all the States to adopt the District system in electing members, has led to a long and tedious debate, between the State rights men and democrats on the one hand, and the ultra whigs on the other. Some of the former have talked loudly of disregarding any such law, and setting the requisition at defiance, as an invasion of the freedom of the several States. Only five States, New-Hampshire, Connecticut, Georgia, New-Jersey, and Rhode Island—all democratic but the last two—retain the general ticket system. The political object of the motion is to secure the election of several whig members in these States, which would be attained under the District system. I have no question that the District system is the most just and equitable in itself. But owing to a division of opinion among the whigs, the compulsory adoption of it will hardly be carried, at this time.

District of Columbia.

An effort will be made, also, to allow a delegate to this District. A measure which should have been adopted long ago. Its legislation is fifty years behind the age. The code of laws remains, substantially, what it was when the District was ceded to the U. S., and in many respects is a disgrace to the country. An attempt to revise it, a few years since, failed, in consequence of the difficulty of disposing of the slavery question. The Southern members found that the Northerners, with all their servility would not, and could not be brought to enact slave laws, in detail. And to call upon them to do so, involved, of necessity, a full discussion of the whole subject of slavery—quite enough to kill the system. Now and then some trivial matter of legal reform is worried through Congress with great effort.

Reports—Private Bills.

Friday and Saturday were spent, chiefly, in debating an old claim, of twenty years standing, utterly untenable in its character. Some contractors for building a fort, many years since, after receiving their pay from the U. S., became insolvent. And under the peculiar mode of distributing a debtor's property, established by the laws of Virginia, giving the preference to certain classes of creditors, the sub-contractors, who did most of the work of building the fort, got no pay for their labor. They ask Congress to tax the nation, accordingly, to pay for the work the second time! Such a modest request will hardly be granted for twenty years to come. But the claimants will probably continue to urge their impudent claim, at a vast expense to the country, for many years, and by dint of perseverance, may succeed.

Two reports have excited much interest. One was from the Committee on Foreign Relations, respecting our trade with the British Colonies, especially the West Indies. Many of your commercial readers will recall the history of the loss of this once immensely valuable and extensive commerce—a loss inflicted upon N. York and New-England by the dictation, and to subserve the self-interests of the sugar and cotten planters. It excited much feeling in the commercial States during Mr. Adams' administration. The remnant of this trade is carried on mostly by British vessels. The ultra Southern party made a strenuous effort to prevent the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the able report, which exhibits this subject in its true light, and which will probably compel the adoption of a policy more favorable to our commerce. The disposition to resist the constant aggressions of the planters upon the industry of the free States, is evidently gaining strength, and ere long, it will turn round and demand the destruction of the slave system, to benefit which, its claims have been so often and so grossly sacrificed. And, as a Southern gentleman remarked to me, a few days ago, "if the North feels that the existence of slavery touches her pocket nerve, her efforts to destroy it will be irresistable."

The other reports are those of Messrs. Stewart and Relley, and the separate one of Gov. Poindexter respecting the affairs of the New-York Custom House, Poindexter's report, it is said, favors the fraudulent foreign importers, and blames all those public officers who have been engaged in enforcing the revenue laws against them. The report of the others is said to be more equitable, and less of a partisan character.—The chief interest of these reports arises from their supposed bearing upon the Whig and Democratic parties. The leaders of each declare that the revelations to be made will make their opponents ashamed to look honest men in the face! A strong effort has been made to suppress the report of the majority of the commission. The charges of fraud and connivance at frauds, implicates so many men of wealth, and of the highest political standing, that there is little chance of anything like a fair investigation of the matter. A fierce struggle took place on the printing the reports, one of which was obtained by a committee of the House in a manner perhaps honorable to themselves from Mr. Poindexter. Both reports prove the existence of enormous frauds on the revenue, and of the agency of leading manufacturers in detecting them, and of leading importers in efforts to destroy those who exposed their mal-practices.

Frauds on the Indians—Texas—Tariff

A bill is before the Senate to confirm certain claims arising under the treaty of "Dancing Rabbit Creek" with the Choctaw Indians, in 1830. Large reservations of land were made, ostensibly for the chiefs, but in part for certain Indian agents and others, who soon swindled the Indians out of their lands, and now call upon Congress to confirm their titles, or pay them the value of the lands. Thus more than $1,500,000 will be wrested from the Indians by a process unhappily too common in the history of our intercourse, especially with the Southern Indians. The Legislature of Mississippi, at their late session, passed resolves urging upon Congress to settle these claims.

☞ The resolves of the same State in favor of the admission of Texas to the Union, ☜ and adverse to a protective tariff, a national bank, and any increase of the national debt, were laid before the Senate on Thursday. The friends of that desperate measure, a union with Texas, mean to have another struggle on the subject, though Mr. Adams' great measure a fortnight since has embarrassed them sadly. They know that the vigilance of the giant cannot be deceived.

The appropriation bill has been amended in some fifty particulars, in many of which the House will not be very likely to concur; others are designed to supply accidental omissions. They have stricken out the proviso to reduce the expenses of the Courts, and salaries of the marshals in New York and Mississippi; added $28,000 to pay off the arrearages of the New York Custom House, and $50,000 to complete that at Boston.

These amendments may delay the final passage of the bill for another month. The Secretary of the Treasury, meantime, has made arrangements with one of the banks to advance money to pay the clerks and other public officers, till Congress shall pass the bill.

Judge Huntington, now Commissioner of the Land Office, has been nominated District Judge for Indiana, the State where he formerly resided. He is a man of moderate talents, and unimpeached worth. But it is thought the Senate will reject him as well as Tyson; more to get rid of his expected successor Proffit, than from any hostility to him. A variety of minor nominations have been confirmed. The Executive is about to make very many removals from office in the Departments, and throughout the country, turning out those who are not willing to support Mr. Tyler's views for the sake of their bread. No matter how faithful an officer is to his duties, he must worship the staff of power or die!

I cannot help attributing much of the rapid demoralization of public officers during the last twelve or fourteen years, to the principle. The substitution of fidelity to power as a qualification for office, for fidelity to the Constitution, the laws, and the duties of office, is radically wrong and immoral. Still, both the old parties seem to be equally in favor of the rigid enforcement of the principle; the Democrats defending it as a correct one, and most of the Whigs calling it a necessary evil.

Yours truly, P. P.

The produce of the olive crops in Candia, during last year, yielded from eleven to twelve millions of pounds of oil, which at the average price of 75f. the 200 lbs., were worth from 4,200,000f. to 4,600,000f.

The mortality among the members of Congress from Pennsylvania, has been very great within a year or two past. Five deaths have occurred since the present delegation from that State were elected, viz: Mr. Ramsay, Mr. Ogle, Mr. Black, Mr. Dimock, and Mr. Lawrence.

News of the Day.

Northeastern Boundary.—There is a rumor from Washington this morning concerning the Northeastern Boundary Question, that Lord Ashburton has proposed to purchase the whole territory in dispute, the price to be settled by the appraisement of Commissioners to be appointed.

The extreme sums named are $1,000,000 to $2,500,000. This important proposition has been submitted by the Secretary of State to the Governors of Maine and Massachusetts, but it is conjectured a party in Maine may defeat it.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

The 44th British Regiment.—This regiment which has been annihilated by the Affghans, formed part of Gen. Packenham's army at the battle of New Orleans; it was then under Col. Muliens, and was disgraced there for not bringing up the fascines in time; and to this circumstance, the disasters of that fatal day were attributed. The regiment then lost their colors, and were sent to India to regain them.—N. Y. Express.

Sentence of Young Cook.—Judge Kent on the 26th ult. sentenced young Cook of Brooklyn, to the state prison for 21 years. Cook, it may be remembered, was tried for the murder of Master Phelps, but acquitted for want of sufficient evidence. He was and is still strongly suspected of being one of the actors in that atrocious deed. He was subsequently suspected of a burglary, and that was but one of the many crimes that could be proved against him, although he is still very young—not more than twenty or twenty-one years old. He is the son of respectable parents, to whom he has been a curse, and not a blessing.

Stayler, convicted of rape, and Berens, of burglary, were sentenced to the state prison for ten years each.

Maple Sugar.—In one school district, in the town of Barre, (known as the Bradford district we believe,) fourteen thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds of sugar have been made this spring, by 15 families, averaging 983 pounds apiece. We should like to know if any section of the State can beat this. Capt. Isaac Vincent, of this town, is not to be sneezed at in this line. He has made from 220 trees, about 1500 pounds.—Vermont Patriot.

The Shawneetown Republican says that there is a fierce excitement raging at present in Gallatin county, Illinois, against free people of color. The excitement has arisen from the organization of a body of men called Regulators, whose avowed object is to force all negroes, without respect to age, sex, condition or character, to leave the country.

The washerwomen in the vicinity of Paris have been detected in smuggling spirits through the gates by saturating washed linen with it, and, when within the city, wringing the spirit out; which being reduced to a proper degree of strength by admixture of water, was sold for consumption.

It would be nothing but moonshine after all without a particle of vital heat. It would not warm into being the most insignificant plant; no not so much as a sprig of red sorrel—like science in Dr. Lardner, divorced from morality.

The Slave's Chance for kind Masters.—In one number of the Chronicle and Sentinel, Augusta, Georgia, we lately found 21 advertisements of slaves for sale. Of this number, 6 were sheriff's sales, advertising men, women and children, seized for their master's debts, to be sold at public auction, with tools, carts, oxen, &c. The remainder were administrators' and executors' sales. If any of these poor creatures had kind masters, what was their chance for a continuance of the blessing?

Harvard University has lately received a donation of $350,000. This sum is the largest legacy ever left to any literary institution in this country, with the exception of Mr. Girard's. One half of the income from this bequest, is to be devoted to the support of the University, for instruction in practical agriculture and ornamental gardening, in botany, and other branches of natural science, to promote the knowledge of agriculture. The residue of the income to be divided equally between the divinity and law school of the University.

The Wheat Crop.—The Lynchburg Virginian says, as far as our information extends in Virginia, the prospect for an abundant crop of wheat was never more flattering than it is this season. If no accident occurs before harvest, our granaries will be well filled.

The Gettysburg (Pa.) Journal states that the crops in Adams county were never in a more favorable condition at the same time of the year.

The Cincinnati Republican says:—in Ohio the wheat crops have never promised better in early spring.

Latest from Mexico.—We have received intelligence from Matamoras to the 3d inst. It appears that the invasion of Texas, on the part of Mexicans, was only a small incursion.

Gen. Arista was at Monterry, four hundred miles from the frontier of Texas.

Gen. Rafael Vasquez, commander of the expedition to Bexar, writes from the banks of the Rio Grande, under date of March 11, and gives an account of his retreat, which was effected without hindrance or molestation on the part of Texas. He says that on his arrival near the Great river, so exhausted were the horses of his men, that had they been attacked, not more than forty of them would have been able to join in the charge.

A letter from Pedro de Ampudia relates that he had captured Goliad with only 120 men.

The Monterry editor says, these operations are only some little preludes to what will follow.

Gen. Vasquez says, the Texans were 260 strong at Bexar, before they abandoned the place.

A letter from Gen. Arista, after expressing his satisfaction that no outrage on the rights of individuals or property, had attended the occupation of Bexar by the Mexican troops, repeats the assurance that the promises held out in his proclamation on the 9th of January, will be strictly fulfilled.

A New York correspondent of the Boston Atlas, under date of the 25th ult. says,—

"It has just been discovered, by a course of minute investigation at the custom house, that the amount of business which has fallen into the hands of foreigners, is beyond what has ever been supposed, and the facts which have been brought to light have aroused the whole business community, who are desirous of pursuing business fairly, to take measures to save themselves from the inroads which are making upon their trade. The inquiry was prosecuted under the superintendence of Mr. Curtis, the collector, and the results may be depended upon as exact in every particular.

"The most important are these—that of all the English dry goods imported into New York, which is a great proportion of the importation of the country, sixty-five per cent., comes consigned from foreign houses to foreign houses, and are exclusively on foreign account. A part, at least a third, of the remainder comes consigned to American houses, but is, in reality on foreign account. In French goods the matter is still worse—eighty-three per cent. being done by Frenchmen and Germans, besides those consigned to Americans.—The French trade is rapidly hastening to be entirely in foreign hands. There remains, even now, but five American houses in the French dry goods trade."

Lady of the Lake—Ontario.—The Oswego papers give a glowing description of the launching of a new steamboat at that place, on Tuesday last, which was witnessed by a multitude of people of that town, and from other places, who, with one voice, as they beheld her glide gracefully down into the water, proclaimed her Lady of the Lake. She is owned principally by citizens of Utica, and is to be run in connection with the steamers St. Lawrence and United States, forming a daily line between Oswego and Lewiston. We are told that she sits like a thing of life upon the water, and is a most perfect specimen of boat building—her style of finish being unsurpassed by any boat upon the lake.—She is of the largest class of steamboats, being 196 feet long, and 24 feet beam, and is to be propelled by a low pressure engine of 100 horse power. We understand that she will be commanded by Capt. J. J. Taylor, a gentleman of great knowledge as a seaman and engineer, and who has heretofore proved himself particularly qualified for the station in all respects.—Utica Observer.

A Smashing Business.—It is estimated by gentlemen acquainted with such matters, that the fourteen British mail steamers belong to the London Company, of which one is now in our port, sink for their owners ten thousand dollars a day, exclusive of the compensation received from the British Government for carrying the mails. The gross yearly loss, at this rate, will be three millions and a half. The Government stipend is about one million: leaving two and a half millions nett loss annually. These steamers are of the burthen of eighteen hundred tons each, and the company, ambitious of extending their enterprises, are now building two more of somewhat larger dimensions.

Rhode Island.—There is little news from Rhode Island in addition to what we have already published. The resolutions introduced by the Speaker, Mr. Jackson, whom we mentioned yesterday, provide, 1, that every male native citizen 21 years old, and possessing $150 worth of taxable property, and who shall have resided in the State one year, vote for Delegates to a Convention to frame a new Constitution, to meet the first week in August; 2, that a majority of such delegates shall constitute a quorum; 3, that the Constitution agreed on shall be submitted to the persons qualified to vote under that Constitution; 4, that if adopted, it shall go into effect at such time as may be specified; 5, that the expenses of the Convention be paid by the State Treasury. These resolutions were debated on Wednesday morning. They were advocated by several gentlemen as a peace-offering that would probably allay the existing excitement and give general satisfaction. On the other hand, they were opposed upon the ground, first, that a new General Assembly is to meet next week, the members of which ought of right to be left to act as they choose in this matter; and, secondly, that it became not the Legislature to adopt such a measure, as it were, upon compulsion. They ought not to act under the menaces of the revolutionists. The majesty of the laws should first be asserted; and there would be time enough then to call a Convention, should the people, by petition, demand the measure at the hands of the new Legislature. The result of the matter was, that the resolutions were rejected, 45 to 12.

The riot act was amended by striking out the proviso that one hour may elapse after making proclamation and dispersing the mob by force. It is evidently the intention of the Assembly to resist force and sustain the existing laws at all hazards.—The Free Suffrage party, on the other hand, seem equally determined to try the issue.

Some Comforts for Repudiators.—The repudiators of Mississippi will doubtless be glad to learn that villany thrives in some other places besides the Mississippi. The liberal, enlightened, refined and honest government of Mexico, has repudiated a debt of $12,000,000, for a loan contracted during the Presidency of Bustamente. The ground upon which Mexico repudiates is fully equal to that assumed by Mississippi, and that is, that the terms of the loan were "prejudicial to the interest of the National Treasury, and an insult to the public morals!" Mississippi and Mexico! McNutt and Santa Anna!—Vicksburg Whig.

A Bad Speculation.—A fellow lately escaped from the jail in Keene, N. H., and was taken a short time after in Arlington, Vt. His captors were proceeding to jail with him when they met two men from Charleston in pursuit. These men purchased the prisoner of his captor for $150, thinking to get the reward of $200 offered for his apprehension. They stopped at Landsgrove for the night, and secured the fugitive with a heavy timber chain, set two large dogs to watch him. They also resolved to watch him themselves, but about two o'clock, both men and dogs fell asleep, and the fellow slily crept out, cut off his shackles with an axe, and cleared. The editor of the Claremont Eagle, who tells the story, says he should like to have seen the fellows the next morning who forked over the hundred and fifty dollars.—Lowell Courier.

From the Rochester Daily Advertiser.

A Perilous Situation.—About a week since, a man and his two sons, one about 14 and the other about 11 years of age, residing in the vicinity of the Rapids, were engaged in fishing below the State Dam.—Owing to negligence, they had approached within dangerous proximity of the falling sheet of water, and on being admonished of the fact, by their female friends on shore, an effort, was made to recede from the boiling pool. That effort, contrary to their intention, threw them directly in "harm's way"—the descending sheet of water struck the boat, throwing its keel up in a moment, and submerging its occupants in an uncomfortable as well as dangerous bath. The youngsters gyrated like potatoes in a boiling pot—appearing on the surface, and anon descending again to the bottom of the pool.

They were rescued however, before they had boiled long; but the case of the father was less fortunate. He managed to get hold of the keel of the boat, but having no power over it, was compelled to follow the freaks of the eddying element.—Slowly would the whirl bear him towards the dam, when boat and man would descend, re-appearing on the outer verge of the pool, but to return to undergo a repetition of the operation. Thus was he made the sport of the elements for three quarters of an hour, his friends the meantime being unable to devise any means of rescue. At length, the boat in passing under the sheet, was stove in, and by a fortunate circumstance, projected without the influence of the whirlpool. The rescue immediately followed, much to the relief of the spectators, as doubtless to him who had so long struggled for life with hardly a prospect of success.

FROM CAMPEACHY.—By the arrival of the schooner Litchfield, Captain Smith, in seven days from Compeachy, we have some late information from Yucatan. On the 9th ult. a United States sloop-of-war belonging to the West India squadron touched at Campeachy on her way to Vera Cruz. The Texas war-schooner San Antonia, was at Campeachy, having on board one of the Santa Fe prisoners, who had escaped, and made his way to Tobasco, where the Texas schooner was lying, and by which he was rescued. The San Antonia was to sail in a few days for New Orleans, for the purpose of refitting.

The citizens of Yucatan were anxiously expecting the arrival of the new commissioners from Santa Anna, who are empowered to settle the difficulties now existing between them, but it is supposed that no treaty can be made, as Santa Anna is well known to be averse to one. The consequences will be war, for which active preparations are now making by the Yucatoes.

The Governor of the State has promulgated a decree confirming the powers of Colonel Francisco Peraya, as Yucatanese agent in Texas, and repeated the instructions relative to the co-operation of the Yucatanese and Texan navies, with the exception of one clause prohibiting hostile operations upon Matamoras.

The man-of-war brig Yucatan, was to sail on a cruise in a few days, the General Lleman and two schooners, were lying in the roadstead, awaiting orders.

The Litchfield brought eighteen cases of Antiquities and specimens of natural history—N. O. Bee, 22d ult.

The Crops.—Having passed through several of the adjacent and interior counties of this state within a few days, we are able to state from observation, as well as on the authority of many farmers with whom we conversed, that the winter grains were never more forward at this season of the year, and never gave earlier or fairer promise of an abundant harvest. It was feared that the open winter might cause the roots to be killed, by the alternate thawing & freezing; fortunately, however, this proves not to be the case, except to a limited extent, on very wet lands. Generally, the wheat and rye fields are already covered with a green, heavy, and luxurious growth, which promises the surest and best antidote for "hard times." If nothing occurs to impede the present rapid progress of the crops, we shall have a very early as well as a heavy harvest.—N. Y. Sun.

The Supreme Court of this State commences its May term at the City Hall to-day, May 2d, before Chief Justice Nelson and Justices Cowen and Bronson. Among the first business of the term will be the motion for a new trial in the case of John C. Colt, convicted of murder. As criminal cases have precedence of civil ones, the argument upon this motion will doubtless be brought on at an early day.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

PRIMARY SCHOOL.

The Trustees of De Ruyter Institute would respectfully inform the public that they have engaged Miss ELIZABETH B. GOODRICH, as a Teacher in the Primary Department. Her long experience in teaching we trust will insure the confidence of all who may wish to patronize said school. The school will commence on Monday, the 25th inst., and continue until the close of the regular Summer Term, or 16 weeks.

☞ Terms of Tuition will be ONE DOLLAR & FIFTY CENTS.

De Ruyter, April 13, 1842.

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers, to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. Every stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25, those wishing to vote by proxy, can do so, by forwarding their votes to some one of the stockholders; naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting also their number of shares.

☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of those kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁎ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

UNITED STATES'

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

CAPITAL,

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS!!!

Incorporated by the State of New York, March 31, 1837, For Twenty-one Years.

CHARTER RENEWED AND AMENDED MAY 5th, 1840,

COMBINING

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE

SHARES $100 EACH.

10 per cent to be paid or secured on subscription.

THE PUBLIC are respectfully informed that the time allowed under the amendment of the charter of this company for completing the subscriptions to their stock, will expire by limitation on the 5th day of May next; in the meanwhile, their books will continue open until the full amount of capital shall have been duly subscribed.

Subscriptions are authorized by the 10th Section of their charter, to be "paid in, or secured to be paid either in stocks of the United States, or the public stocks created by this or any other state, or in the stock of any incorporated bank of this or any other state, which shall be at par in the New York market at the time or in the stock of the corporation of the city of New York, or on bond and mortgage or unincumbered real estaate of this state, of the value of fifty per cent. more than the amount loaned thereon, exclusive of buildings, unless the same shall be insured from loss by fire, or in specie, certified checks, or current bank bills."

Should the full amount of capital not be subscribed in cash payments, or secured by bank city, or state stocks, as above described, on or before the 15th day of March, the balance will be filled by a selection of the best bonds and mortgages on improved and unincumbered real estate within the city or state of New York, such as the company would readily loan their funds upon, if the capital was all paid in cash; but should the full amount of capital be subscribed in cash, bank, city, or state stocks, on or before the 15th day of March, then the subscription books will be closed, without receiving any real estate.

Applications for stock can be made in the mean time to either of the Commissioners, whether the intention be to pay in money, stocks, or real estate.

The opportunity this company presents to capitalists throughout the Union for a safe and profitable investment, can now be improved, and subscriptions in money, or sound bank stocks made sure, as well as those in city or state stocks.

It will be noticed on reference to the prices current, that the prices of insurance stocks in New York are higher by 25 per cent on an average, than any other stocks on the list, and the liberal terms of subscription offered by this company, are not elsewhere to be found. Negotiations have been made in London with the most eminent bankers there for a cash subscription to this stock, within six weeks, of from $500,000 to $600,000, to be permanently invested in the best of American 6 per cent, state stocks in London.

POETRY.

From the Ladies' Repository.

Niagara Above the Falls.

BY REV. WM. WINANS.

Hail, beauteous child of mighty inland seas,
Niagara! Smiling, thou glidest on,
With ample tribute, to Ontario's lap.
Calm is thy bosom. Brightly imag'd there
The radiant face of heav'n; and near thy shores,
In pictur'd loveliness, thou show'st how fair
The rock, and trees, and flow'rs upon thy bank.
Nor beauteous only—strong and active, thou
Bear'st in thine arms the wealth of social states,
Who interchange superfluous joys; and firm,
Thou barr'st contending nations, who would shed
Each other's blood. Yet be not proud; tho' fair,
Active, and strong, and doing good to man,
Soon shall thy fortunes change; soon thou must be
Despoil'd of beauty, crippl'd, and derang'd,
A sight of terror, shunn'd with heedful care.
The heav'ns shall see their visage imag'd back
Distorted, hideous, broken, and thy waves
Lash'd into fury, dash'd from rock to rock,
No more shall show the beauties of thy banks.
And thou, disorder'd, madd'ng, thus shalt rush,
With headlong fury, on to meet thy fate.
Unmark'd, abrupt, the precipice's edge
Is just before thee. There, forlorn, thou'lt plunge
Down, down the fearful steep. Thy groans shall shake
The solid steadfast earth, thy tears o'erspread
With clouds the face of heav'n, and thou, thy self,
Mangl'd and writhing, lie a wretched thing,
Broken, dismay'd confounded,
And thus man,
Gay, thoughtless, eager man, runs blithely on,
Rejoicing in his strength, vain of his wit,
Exulting in their worth, till stern misfortune,
Ruthless disease, or with'ring age proclaims
The doom that waits him in a thoughtless hour,
And comes unlook'd for, e'ven tho' long foretold
Then plunges headlong into the abyss
Of darkness, whence his groans arise to tell
His ruin'd fate, forsaken of his God.

Miscellaneous Department.

ORIGIN OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

London is first mentioned as a Roman settlement, in the reign of Nero, A. D. 61, when it was the residence of a great number of merchants and dealers. Long before their taking possession of it, however, it was a village of the Belgic Britons, who were a mixture of Gauls and Germans, but more German than Gælic. It was built in a wood fortified with ramparts and ditches, and hence its name, Lund, or the Wood, and Lunduyn, the fortified wood, or hill. It is indebted to no splendid origin or adventitious aid, except being the seat of government, but has risen to its present grandeur and opulence by its intrinsic merits, the advantage of its situation, and the industry and commercial spirit of its inhabitants. The Romans soon discovered its convenient situation, for a military station, and established a magazine of stores and provisions there, A. D. 51.

The first notice of London as a place of commercial importance, occurs in the annals of Tacitus, who speaks of it as the noble emporium of his time, the great resort of the merchants, and famous for its social intercourse, though not a colony.

About the year 886, London, which appears to have been almost totally destroyed and depopulated by the Danes, was restored and more strongly fortified by Alfred, and soon after filled with inhabitants who had been driven into exile, or kept in captivity by the Danes.

In the year 1556, a manufactory of the finest sort of glasses, was established in Friars, and fine flint glass, little inferior to that of Venice, was at the same time made at the Savoy. Seven years afterwards a manufactory of knives was began by Thomas Matthews of Fleet Bridge.

The whole number of merchants in London, in 1568, were, in all, only three hundred and twenty-six.

In the year 1579, Hubblethorn, a dyer, was sent to Persia, at the expense of the city of London, to learn the art of dying there, and of making carpets.

In the year, 1564, the use of coaches was introduced by a Dutchman named Wm. Boonen, who became the Queen's coachman, and before many years, divers great ladies made themselves coaches, and rode up and down the countries.

Shortly before that period, the knowledge and wear of lawns and cambrics were introduced by the Dutch merchants, who retailed those articles in ells, yards, &c., for there was not then one shopkeeper amongst forty that durst buy a whole piece.

About the fifth or sixth year of the reign of Elizabeth, the manufacture of pins was introduced, and in her eighth year the manufacture of needles was first taught.

About the same time the making of earthern furnaces, earthern fire-pots, and earthern ovens, transportable, was first taught in London, without Moorgate, by Richard Dyer, who brought the art from Spain.

Women's masks, muffs, fans, bodkins, periwigs, were introduced from France about the time of the massacre in Paris, 1572–1577. Pocket watches were first brought into London from Nuremburg, in Germany, where they were thought to have been invented.

The printing of prices current was first adopted by John Day, of London, in 1634.

The banking business commenced in 1545, as appears from a rare pamphlet, entitled "The misery of the new fashioned goldsmiths or bankers discovered;" and in which it is stated that the merchants and traders of London, no longer daring to confide, as before in the integrity and care of their apprentices and clerks, who frequently go into the army, began first at this period to lodge their cash in the hands of goldsmiths, whom they commissioned both to receive and to pay for them. The goldsmiths, quickly perceiving the advantage that might be derived from this capital, soon allowed a regular interest on all sums deposited.

In the same year, also, the use of coffee was introduced into London by a Turkish merchant, who brought home with him a Ragusan Greek, by whom the manner of roasting and making coffee was first made known.

In the year 1676, the wear of India muslin was introduced into London, and soon became prevalent. In this year, also, the Hudson Bay Company was incorporated with very enlarged powers, and the manufacture of fine glass was brought to perfection through the encouragement of the duke of Buckingham, who procured makers, grinders, and polishers of glass, from Venice, to settle in England.

The printing of calicoes was first practised in London in 1687, and nearly at the same time the weaver's loom was introduced into the metropolis from Holland, and it was called the Dutch loom engine.

The great increase of the population, and domestic traffic of the Metropolis, led to that useful establishment, the penny post—which was set up by Murray, an upholster, in the year 1684.

The year 1694 became a most memorable one in the commercial annals of the Metropolis by the institution of the Bank of England, which was incorporated by charter on the 29th of July, the effects of which on the trade, prosperity, revenue, &c., exerted a very beneficial and salutary influence.

ROMAN CATHOLIC DOCTRINES.

On page 40 of Bishop Doyle's abridgement of Christian Doctrine, are the following Questions and Answers:

Q. By what kind of sins are the commandments broken?

A. By mortal sins only; for venial sins are not, strictly speaking, contrary to the end of the commandments, which is charity.

Q. How declare you that?

A. Because a venial sin, for example, a vain word, an officious or jesting lie, which hurts nobody, the theft of a pin or an apple, is not of weight enough to break charity betwixt man and man, much less betwixt God and man.

On page 53 is the following Question and Answer:

Q. When is a theft mortal sin?

A. When the thing stolen is of considerable value, or causeth considerable hurt to our neighbor.

On page 55 is the following Question and Answer:

Q. When is a lie a mortal sin?

A. When it is any great dishonor to God, or notable prejudice to our neighbor.

On page 83 is the following Question and Answer:

Q. What is venial sin?

A. A small and very pardonable offense against God, or our neighbor.

Now would any intelligent man have believed that such doctrines could be propogated by men calling themselves Christians, had he not the evidence at hand in the Romish Books? Theft does not break the commandment, unless the thing stolen be of "considerable value," and a lie does not break the commandment unless it involve "great dishonor to God;" or "notable prejudice to our neighbor." Just as though that God who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, had left it with the thief, or the liar, to graduate his guilt by the amount stolen, or by the grossness of the lie! Just as though that God who hath said, "Lie not one to another," had said, "Lie not to the great dishonor of God, or so as to eventuate in notable prejudice to your neighbor!" Just as though that God who hath said, "Thou shalt not steal," had made the breaking of this commandment to be only by stealing that which is of considerable value!

On page 13 and 14 is the following Question and Answer:

Q. What understand you by the words born of the Virgin Mary?

A. I understand that Christ was born of her at midnight, in a poor stable at Bethlehem, betwixt an ox and an ass.

Here is a discovery which one knows not how exactly to receive,—whether to smile at the credulity of those who can make such an answer, or to weep over the wretched mind that could turn the blessed book of God into ridicule.

On page 28 is the following Question and Answer:

Q. At what age and stature shall men rise?

A. At a perfect age, which is thirty-three, and in that stature which they should have had at a perfect age, without deformity by defect or excess.

The proof of this discovery in systematic Divinity, is as rare a specimen of discovery in hermeneutics. What think you is the proof? On page 28 you have the Answer.

Q. How prove you this?

A. Out of Ephes. iv. 13. "The Church shall last until we all meet into a perfect man, into the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ."

Now if even an intelligent Romanist can make sense of this passage, then it is confessed he may make it prove that we shall rise at the age of thirty-three, or any thing else he may feel disposed to assert.

By way of giving a further specimen of Romish discovery both in Biblical antiquities, and in Biblical interpretation, there is the following question and answer, on page 31 and 32.

Q. How do you prove it lawful to adorn the Churches with tapestry, pictures, and the like?

A. Out of St. Mark, xiv. 15, where Christ commanded his last supper to be prepared in a great chamber adorned!

On page 82 is the following Question and Answer:

Q. Whither go infants that die without Baptism.

A. To a part of Hell where they endure the pain of loss, and shall never see the face of God.

Now, Mr. Editor, here are some specimens of the peculiarities of "Romanism as it is, taken from their own work, and quoted word for word, without omission or alteration. If any Romanist can show that I have not quoted correctly, let him do so.

From the New York Mirror.

THE DELIVERANCE OF ISRAEL.

Even when the Israelites were fettered, generation after generation, to the Egyptian soil, and a deepening slavery of two hundred years must have seemed to set a seal to their exclusion, the principal sacredly survived. The parents of Moses preserved the infant in the strength of a supernatural hope. Moses himself, when his fame and genius had grown to maturity, "mighty in words and deeds," the statesman and the soldier, with all the temptations of royal rank and opulence before him, refused to abandon his hope in the promise "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God."

But his individual trial was to grow more severe. In an attempt to arouse the spirit of his countrymen he failed, and made the bitter discovery that they had lost all the feelings essential to freedom. He was pursued by the vengeance of the king, fled into the desert, and there, relinquishing for ever the hopes and habits of a life of distinction and command, took the staff of the shepherd.

Yet from this period the supremacy of Providence only ascends to a broader splendour. Means, the most utterly below human calculation, produce effects the most utterly above it: all is inadequacy on the part of man. To raise a nation of slaves to a nation of freemen, proverbially a task requiring the most extraordinary union of ability and ambition, is the task laid upon a man eighty years old, and still more disqualified by circumstances than by age; a fugitive in the desert, sunk into the monotonous life of a keeper of sheep, totally cut off from the country of his birth, and calmed into "the meekest man on earth." Even when the divine call comes to him, he exhibits reluctance, pleads personal inability, and finally yields only to a miracle.

The conditions of this great achievement placed it still more beyond the range of human faculties. In the face of the most civilized and powerful kingdom of their time, the deliverance of the Israelites was to be effectd without the sword. The slave born was to be rescued from the slavemaster by an act of public will, and not merely to obtain his freedom, but a portion of that master's wealth as a compensation for slavery. The deliverance was not to be an escape but a triumph. The people were to march out in the open day, with the king, the nobles and the troops of Egypt looking on, yet not daring to lift a weapon against the most helpless af all multitudes; a moving nation encumbered with infancy and age, with flocks and herds and with the provisions for their Journey to Palestine.

But this event only coincides with the general purpose of the interposition; that of impressing man with a sense of providential power. The people were wholly passive. The Ten Plagues, a series of miracles fought the battle; in all displaying the mighty hand of God alone; completed by the signal and final overthrow of the crowned oppressor and his troops, the instruments of his tyranny; at once displaying to the chosen people the divine wrath against the incorrigible crime, and securing their march unmolested across the wilderness.

Moorish Women.—Nothing can equal, says a French writer, the surprise of an European when he finds himself for the first time, face to face with a Moorish woman. Instead of one of those graceful and beautiful creatures, whose description had inflamed his inexperienced imagination, he sees before him nothing but a white shapeles mass, which seems to move with difficulty, and would leave nothing to suspect life, were it not for the dark and expressive eyes which flash with a brilliant lustre in the narrow space between the two veils, one of which descends as far as the middle of the forehead, while the other entirely covers the lower part of the face.—Much experience and skill is requisite to judge, through this collection of drapery, under which the jealous Mussulman husbands oblige their wives to conceal their faces from profane eyes, of the age, or the style of beauty of an Algerine lady. But the eyes of an exercised observer triumphs over all those obstacles, and from the little that he was permitted to see, he can judge of that which they seek to conceal. Thus, for example the presence of certain wrinkles under the ankle bone is sufficient for him to determine whether a woman is verging toward the decay of the limit which separates youth from maturity, or if she has passed it. It is without doubt to conceal this troublesome index that a great number of the Moorish ladies have adopted the European custom of wearing stockings.—But there still exists another means to ascertain the chronology of the dark beauty; if the arch of the eyebrow presents a slender ridge, if the globe of the eye is deeply sunk in the socket, the conclusion is nearly certain that the subject under observation has reached an epoch of life particularly dreaded by the Algerine lady; for the husband only loves her company so long as she preserves all the freshnes and charms of youth, and the woman who has reached thirty, far from being, as in the romance of Balzac, at the apogee of her Empire and triumphs, has become for some time past an object of indifference, often even of scorn.

There are other marks, even under the veil; for the handkerchief intended to cover the face being tied firmly behind the head adheres very closely to the features. The face of a Moorish lady presents the unseemingly effect of a mask moulded in plaster, and the veil translates with a disagreeable fidelity and accuracy the depression and angular projections of the ripe age. The young Algerine beauties who have all to gain and nothing to lose by suffering themselves to be discovered, are particularly careful to use hankerchiefs extremely thin, and thus find means to reconcile their natural coquettery with an exigency which they all in secret curse.—Ladie's Gazette.

Economy on a Small Scale.—So far as our experience goes, it establishes the position that the very first expense a man retrenches, when he gets into an economical fit, is the subscription to his newspaper.—'Newspapers are things,' argues he, 'which can be dispensed with, and cost money that might be saved.' Agreed; so may the schooling of our children—so, indeed, may nine-tenths of the articles necessary to our comfort and support. Any one may get rich who will live on bread and clothe himself in rags. But who would live a brute, for the mere pleasure of saving money which he cannot carry hence with him? There are few such—five or ten in a million, and how wretched are they! Most men, sensible that they must die, are disposed to enjoy a little of the fruit of their labor; and nothing is perhaps more necessary to the enjoyment of society or to self-satisfaction in retirement, than the well informed and virtuous mind. It gives zest to all things in prosperity, and is the best resource in adversity. Newspapers are the best possible channels for obtaining an acquaintance with the affairs of the world, and to implant desires in the hearts of youth for maturity. In truth, they are the great engines that move the moral and political world, and not only aid in establishing the character, but in preserving the liberties of a people. Viewed in this light, and it is not too strong a one, we would ask—are there not an hundred items of expenditure, which a person ought to cut off rather than deprive himself of the solid benefit derived from a good newspaper?

To preserve Bacon from Flies.—My simple mode of preserving Bacon may be of use to some of your readers. I lay it down in charcoal, and find it preserved from the fly and kept perfectly sweet and without any further trouble than putting the coal between the several layers. I do not even pound the coal up fine, but take it from the coal heap just as it comes, coarse and fine together. When I want a cut of bacon I take it off and put the remainder back, or throwing some of the fine charcoal on the fresh cut surface, hang up the remainder, and so cut from it until it is all consumed. The flies will not touch it. The coal dust is easily washed off before cooking, and the coal in which it has been packed, is as good for burning as ever.—Rusticies Junior.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica,

VISITING ON THE SABBATH DAY.

This is a practice which, I fear is very prevalent at the present day, even among the prefessing people of God. The Lord's day is often spent in a manner very different from the design of its appointment. Instead of being spent in the public and private worship of God, it is devoted to every species of idleness and dissipation. Multitudes are to be found in all parts of our country, who spend a great part of its sacred hours in sauntering about the fields, the sea shores, or other places where they may meet with companions equally desirous with themselves, of killing time. Others lounge at home and yawn away over the fire in listless difference, or assembled in their neighbors' houses to descant on the political affairs of the day, or to retain the scandal of the neighborhood. Many merchants devote this holy day to the settling of the business of the counting house, or set out on a journey to prosecute their traffic abroad. Multitudes more devote the day to feasting, and spend it in paying or receiving visits. All these methods of acting are utterly inconsistent with the sanctity of the Sabbath. It is plain to every reflecting mind that all such persons are violating the appointment of heaven, and trampling under foot a most holy institution, since we are enjoined by the supreme authority of God himself, to remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Of this law they are all transgressors, and should all consider what they are doing, and what guilt they are contracting, and to what misery they are exposed. "The house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness: they walked not in my statutes, and they despised my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them: and my Sabbath they greatly polluted, then I said I would pour out my fury upon them in the wilderness, to consume them."—Ezekiel xx. 13.

It would lead into too extensive a discussion were I in this article to consider all those different methods of violating the Sabbath at present, and to point out particularly the evil of each. I shall confine my remarks to the evil and inconsistency of Sabbath visiting.

I observe, then, in the first place, that I do not mean to condemn Sabbath day visiting in every case. I allow that a visit may be made on the Sabbath from religious motives, and in a religious manner, and may be productive of salutary results. Persons, whose acquaintance or friends are laboring under great distress of mind, or confined to a sick chamber, may very properly visit them on the Lord's day, when they cannot accomplish it on other days. But, if they visit them, the law of kindness should direct them to sympathise with them in a godly and friendly manner, and excite them to endeavor to administer some spiritual comfort, and they will be at the same time comforted and benefited themselves—"he that watereth shall be watered also himself." Prov. ix. 25. An occasional visit may be made to persons in health: but when it is done they should not prevent each other from keeping the Sabbath holy to God. They should not keep one another at home, but go in company to the house of God, and this would tend to prevent them from grossly misspending the hours of a day which should be devoted to the preparing of the soul for a never ending Sabbath beyond the grave. They should not waste the time together, showing their farms, their gardens, their elegant furniture, their fine clothes; but they should give the whole time to religious and edifying discourse, which may be of mutual benefit.—But such visits are so rare that they do not weigh the weight of a feather against the sum of the evil of which I am now treating—and even where the company is select, and the persons pious, the world is so apt to obtrude, and secularize the mind and the conversation, that among the most religious, Sabbath visits to persons in health, had, in general, better be ommitted than performed—for we are commanded to "abstain from all appearance of evil." 1. Thess. v. 22.

I observe then that the Sabbath visits are very improper. When God requires us to devote the day to him, surely it is sinful to take the day to ourselves, or spend its precious moments with our friends. Yet this is the case with the majority of Sabbath visiters. They are violators of the law of God, and profaners of the Sabbath day. A practice that naturally tends to such a result must be wrong, and should be relinquished as improper. If Sabbath visits were conducted in a manner suitable to the holy day, they would be less frequent, for those who are chiefly addicted to them would change their nature or give them up.

I observe again, that Sabbath visiting is in many cases utterly inexcusable. There are many who are prone to this practice who have no occasion for any such resource as they have nothing to prevent them from seeing their friends on other days. Neither business nor any necessary avocations prevent them during the other days of the week—indeed they often defer purposely seeing their friends on the six days, so that they may have the pleasure of visiting them on the Sabbath—without loosing the time which they have devoted to secular gain. But, as if this were not sufficient, or more than sufficient, the blessed day of rest must be lost in a vain show, or in occupations equally tasteless and unworthy. Such persons have no excuse for their conduct, they do not wish to spend this day better. They are not careful to spend it well, but how they may waste it, in every kind of sinful amusement. If they would be pursuaded to observe the Sabbath as they ought, they would obtain pleasure more noble, more rational, and more satisfying to the demands of their immortal souls—they would become habituated to pursuits more dignified, and more profitable. To quote the sentiments of the learned and pious Chief Justice Hale of England a well spent Sabbath, is followed by a prosperous and happy week, and a week profitably spent would prepare for a joyous and delightful Sabbath, free from vanity and folly, but filled up with heavenly exercises, salutary and consolatory to the mind and body.

I remark in the last place, that Sabbath visiting is very injurious. It often happens, that where this practice is only occasionally introduced, it becomes customary by repetition, till at last, it becomes necessary to the satisfaction of the person. He finds no ease nor comfort but when he is occupied in paying or receiving visits. The mind of such an individual is drawn off from all serious reflection on eternal things, or attention to eternal realities. Religious principle cannot obtain a hold where religious knowledge cannot gain an entrance: and where religious duties are treated with neglect. Beginnings of this kind have not unfrequently ended in irreligion and infidelity. France is an awful example of the truth of this, and surely a course of conduct that may be productive of such effects must be highly criminal, and ought to be relinquished as soon as possible. It is not a solemn truth that almost every criminal on whom the sentence of the law is executed lament Sabbath profanation as one of his earliest and blackest crimes? and can there be any custom more likely to lead to such an end, than that of Sabbath visiting as it now exists. It is calculated to destroy every distinction between that holy day and others—it is fitted to lead the mind to despise the sacred duties of the sanctuary and altogether to forfeit and overlook the nature and design, of the Sabbath day. Visits productive of such consequences may originate in kindness but it is kindness misplaced and ill-applied. When we visit on Sabbath, let it be for a good reason, and with a good design let us steadily observe the nature and duty of the day, and studiously avoid every thing inconsistent with these or let us give up Sabbath visiting altogether—Remember the Sabbath day to keep it HOLY.

From the New York Observer.

THE CONVERSION OF THE WORLD.

The claims of the heathen upon the benevolence of the Christian Church.

One of the primary and distinguished features of Christianity is that of benevolence.—The Christian religion teaches us, not only to love God with all our heart, but our neighbor as ourselves. This principle is ingrafted into the whole Christian system.—The most perfect example of benevolence which the world ever saw apeared in Christ himself. It was most emphatically true of him, that he pitied human woes, and labored to alleviate human sufferings. It ought to be remembered too, that in this, he set us an "example that we should walk in his steps." This example of his was imitated, to a certain extent, by the apostles and their companions in tribulation. Who has not admired the tenderness of spirit, and the deep concern for the welfare of his fellow men, which was evinced by the life and labors of the Apostle Paul? Whether it be true or false that disinterested benevolence necessarily constitutes a part of Christian character, yet it is perfectly obvious that true religion cannot exist independent of a sincere desire for the promotion of the glory of God, and the welfare of man. It is the glory of Christianity that it teaches man to love his fellow man. Heathenism has been known to provide a hospital for the accommodation of old, and decrepit, and worn-out brutes; but never to put forth effort for the relief of suffering humanity.—In this respect, Christianity states on an eminence high above every other form of religion.

But what are the objects of benevolence which call for the sympathies of the Christian world? It is evident that the poor and famishing are the proper objects of Christian charity. If a starving beggar come to the door of our dwelling and ask for bread, we can have no heart to deny his request. To provide for the accommodation of men of this class, Christianity itself has prompted to the erection of numerous alms-houses in every part of our land. Was not that a commendable benevolence which moved the way-faring Samaritan to relieve the miseries of his neighbor when he had fallen among thieves, and had been robbed and well-nigh murdered by a band of cruel unprincipled desperadoes?

But it is not the man who has fallen into a pit, or who is emaciated with hunger, or who has been stripped of his property by flood or flame, that is to be regarded as the only proper object of Christian charity.—Christianity teaches us to instruct the ignorant as well as to feed the hungry; nor is it a principle less high or less holy which prompts the desire to reclaim the bessotted inebriate from the crimes and the miseries in which he has become involved. Christianity leads us to weep over human guilt, as well as human sorrow.

But, have the heathen no claims upon our sympathies and benevolence? Are they not poor, and ignorant, and vicious, and oppressed? It alters not the case that their sufferings are not endured, nor their crimes committed, within the range of our vision. Testimony is abundant that millions of the human family are in a state of the deepest moral degradation. And have we no sympathies for them, nor they any claims upon our charities? It cannot be. Yes—the heathen have a claim upon us as Christians, if not as philanthropists. And this claim has been long since acknowledged by the Christian world. It was acknowledged in the early age of the Christian era, by the apostles.—True, indeed, the gospel was preached by them, first to their own countrymen. This the Savior directed. But their labors were not confined to the nation of the Jews. Paul considered himself a debtor both to the Jews and the Barbarians, to the wise and the unwise. It was a debt of benevolence, but still, it was a debt. Such is the debt which the Christian church now owes to the heathen world. And the church, in the age which immediately succeeded the ascension of Christ, did actually engage most vigorously in prosecuting the work of foreign missions. In modern times, too, (though the church slept long over her responsibilities,) she has acknowledged the claims of the heathen upon her benevolence, her prayers, and her self-denying labors. The Moravians, more than a century ago, entered upon the missionary work, and have prosecuted it with vigor to the present day. They engaged in the work of missions as early as 1732; and they have endured incredible hardships, they have accomplished much good.

In 1795 the people of Great Britain acknowledged these claims by the formation of the London Missionary Society. In this country also, their claims have been recognised by the various denominations of evangelical Christians. It is true that the American church indulged her slumbers for years after some of her fellow servants had gone forth into the field; but she has at length begun to wake up, and to listen to the cries of the perishing millions in heathen lands who are famishing for want of the bread of life. Christians of various names have each their separate organization for the prosecution of this noble work. While the field is so large, there is abundant room for the labors of each and of all; and it is desirable that each may provoke the other to greater zeal, and more persevering effort to extend the knowledge of salvation to the myriads of human beings that are perishing for lack of the gospel of Christ.

EFFECT OF MUSIC.

The effect of music furnishes an argument for its use in divine worship. All men are moved by it, more or less. A single song, used in France, and appealing powerfully to popular feeling, was one of the instrumentalities in bringing on that revolution, which many years since surprised half the civilized world with its terrors. The effect of the first performance of the Hallelujah Chorus, in Handel's Messiah, were such as to raise the vast assembly from their seats, almost unconsciously to themselves. Music not only powerfully affects man, but even the lower animals. If such then be the power of music, it should be regarded as of inestimable worth in aiding the devotions of immortal beings assembled as worshipers of the "Most High God." Let the Church patronize, cultivate, and employ it for the purposes for which it is so eminently adapted; and what may it not accomplish for the advancement of piety and devotion?

The Christian comes to the sanctuary burdened with trouble and sorrow, afflicted with some bereavement, or beset with temptations, or oppressed with a sense of unworthiness and guilt before God. How sweetly the soothing influence of sacred song will sometimes come over his spirit. It calms the troubled waves of his soul, as did the voice of Jesus, the stormy sea, when he said, "Peace, be still." The Christian is thus led to adore a father who 'pitieth his children.' 'Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust," says the Scripture; and from deepest sorrows thus break tenderest, sweetest song. The weight under which the soul has been bowed down, is removed. The mourner is comforted; the trembling believer established, quickened, and strengthened; the contrite heart sweetly drawn to a reconciled God; and courage is gathered by the Christians for the "good fight of faith."

Eminent Christians have testified their experience for the benefits of sacred music, as they have those derived from meditation, prayer and hearing the word. A devoted female Missionary, speaking of a Sabbath service in a dark and dreary land, writes, 'My soul was refreshed particularly in the singing, and I thought of the bliss of heaven. President Edwards writes, 'I often used to sit and view the moon for continuance; and in the day spent much time in viewing the clouds and sky, to behold the sweet glory of God in these things; in the mean time singing forth with a low voice my contemplations of the Creator and Redeemer.' 'I felt God, so to speak, at the appearance of a thunder storm; and used to take the opportunity, at such times, to fix myself, in order to view the clouds, and see the lightning play, and hear the majestic and awful voice of God's thunder, which oftentimes was exceedingly entertaining, leading me to sweet contemplation of my glorious God. While thus engaged it always seemed natural to me to sing or chant forth my meditations, or to put my thoughts in soliloquies with a singing voice."

The deepest feelings of the Christian, then, find the most natural channel, for their flow, in music. This accounts for the fact, that in the Scriptures sacred song is described as the medium of the liveliest joys and most exalted praises of heaven. The most inspiring songs of earth are immeasurably surpassed by those in the temple 'not made with hands,' and from the choir of the 'New Jerusalem.' There is worship to God perfect; praise offered 'in the beauty of holiness.' There performs a choir 'which no man can number,' and which has been formed and taught by the Son of God. There are employed harps, 'strung and tuned for endless years.' Eternity will never know dissonance, nor weariness, nor faltering in the songs of praise, before 'the throne of God and the Lamb.' 'The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads.' And they sung a new song, saying, 'Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood.' 'And I heard the voice of harpers, harping with their harps; and they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts and the elders; and no man could learn that song save the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth.'

Now we cannot suffer heartless criticism disjoined from taste, for either earthly or heavenly harmonies, to wrest from us our faith, or discourage our anticipations, that music will minister to the bliss for which we hope in heaven. We do, and will believe, that 'sounds of glory,' will help to swell the 'amazing joys' of the redeemed. While the pious soul takes wings from amid the scenes of earthly worship, and dissolves in tenderness and joy under the power of sacred music, there is rapture in the thought, "If so sweet be the songs of Zion on earth, what must be the holy harmonies of heaven?"—Hooker.

THE AGED SINNER.

There is nothing more grievous to a benevolent man, than to see an aged person tottering over the grave, and yet unmindful of eternity. Oh! he will say, it is a dreadful sight to see old persons making more provision for life than preparation for death! What awful folly and madness, to prepare for that which they cannot enjoy, and to neglect that which they cannot avoid. The steel being spent, the knife cannot cut—the sun being set, the day cannot tarry—and old age being come, life cannot long endure. It is the eleventh hour, and almost the last minute of that hour. The lamp is just flickering in the socket, and there is the whole work of a life to do, or the soul must be undone forever.

I once heard the following conversation between an old man and a Mr. Wilson:—"Well my friend," said Mr. W. "you have had a long walk, pray how old are you?"—"Seventy-three, last birth-day." "And you are still permitted to enjoy a comfortable degree of health and vigor." "Oh, yes, as well as ever I was in my life; as likely to live fifty years as anybody." "Oh, my friend, do not deceive yourself with so very improbable an idea. It is very unlikely you should live fifty months; you have already been permitted to advance far beyond the ordinary boundaries of the life of man; and you ought to live in daily expectation of death, and in constant preparation for it. What is your hope for another world, if today should finish your existence in this?"—"Time enough to think about that, sir, when death is a little nearer. I hope I shan't be cut off so quickly but what I shall have time to say, Lord have mercy upon me!" "Alas! alas! and can you venture your immortal soul on such a vain, precarious foundation. If you really think you shall need mercy then, why do you not cry for mercy now while the opportunity is afforded you? My soul trembles to think of your awful condition." "Don't disturb yourself about me," said the insensible old man; "you know every tub must stand upon its own bottom; and I dare say I shall do very well at last. Good day to you, sir."

Mr. Wilson then turned to some young persons who happened to be present, and charged us to remember our Creator in the days of our youth, and not deceive ourselves with the thought that old age must needs brings piety with it.

A very few weeks after this, I saw the man's son with a crape hat-band, and learned that his father was dead; and there was every reason to fear that he died as he had lived, without God and without hope!—Abbott.

IMITATE CHRIST.—Let Christians, whenever they are tempted to be proud, or to act contrary to the example of the Lord Jesus, suppose him once more addressing them, individually, in such terms as these: "How ill does pride or haughtiness become thee, O my disciple! when thy master was meek and lowly, and so much debased himself! Was he so poor? Blush, then, to think that thou art ashamed of poverty, or so anxious to avoid it. Did I condescend to wash the feet of my apostles? and can you reckon the meanest office of charity, self-denial, or condescension, beneath you? Did I affect state or grandeur, and can you be vain of costly furniture or apparel? When you hear me, in my word, ascribing all the glory to God, will you seek and delight in the applause mortals? If I pleased not myself, do you deserve the name of my disciple, when seeking to please yourself? Did the most outrageous insults and injustice only excite my pity, and not provoke me to anger; and shall disrespect, affronts, or even injuries, blow up my servant to sinful passion, resentment, and revenge? Did I drink off my cup of unmingled bitterness without repining; and shall a small drop of gall, in affliction or disappointment, cause thee to murmur or complain; Why, O why, has the example of your Master so little influence upon your temper and conduct?—Remember me, and be humble, patient, and mortified to self and the world.—Dr. H. Hunter.

A WORD TO PASTORS.—He is not a pastor who is never met by a smiling child in the streets; and such a man, minister as he may be, we pity for his unpardonable negligence of a pleasing duty. It is a fixed part of our belief, that a Christian minister should be well acquainted with every family where he has a member of his church; and as many of the families of hearers as possible; not the heads only, but the children and the servants. They expect it, and the expectation is reasonable; and he will do little good in any house who leaves neglected the youth and domestics. To notice them regularly, affectionately, and religiously, is to engage and obtain many hearts, members for the church, and saints for glory; and these shall honor the good man as he passes through the streets with their pleasing looks and blessings. The Savior exercised a lovely supremacy, when, as he entered into Jerusalem, children strewed his path with branches of palm trees. Wesley never appeared more like St. John than when, with children on his knee, and others thronging him, as he sang songs for them on the rural hearth. And to us no part of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" is more pleasing than that which says of the Village Preacher,

> "Ev'n children followed, with endeavoring wile,
> And plucked his gown to share the good man's smile."

FORGIVENESS.

'I am afraid,' said Mrs. Williams to her husband, "I am afraid, my dear, that we are cultivating in our son a spirit which we would be very unwilling to see him act out in future life."

'Why, what do you mean, wife?' said Mr. Williams, 'I am not conscious of doing any such thing.'

'Well, I am; and this very morning when I was making his military dress for him, and fitting him off for his little 'training company,' as he called it, I could not help thinking how proud he felt, or how I was assisting in encouraging the very spirit of war in his little heart.'

She had hardly uttered the sentence, before a noise was heard in the street, and looking out of the window, they saw two companies of little boys engaged in real battle, tearing each other's clothes, and striking each other with their mock guns; and soon in ran little Frank, with his face covered with blood, and breathing out slaughter and threatenings against his playmates, with whom he had always lived on the most friendly terms.

'Mother,' he cried, 'where's father's cane? Give it to me right off—and if I don't give William Johnson a sound drubbing, I'm mistaken:' and then he burst into a flood of tears, in a paroxysm of wrath.

'There, my dear,' said Mrs. Williams, 'I told you so; and here we have the proof.'

'My son,' said Mr. W. 'come to me;' and taking him by the arm, he wiped the blood from his face; and before he endeavored to reason with him, tried to soothe his irritated feelings, and allay his angry passions.

'And what would you do, my dear," said his father, "with my heavy cane?'

'Why, father, I would knock him down, to be sure,' said Frank.

'But, my dear, you might kill him; and how would you feel, if, by an unlucky blow upon his temple, you should take the life of your little playmate? You see, my son, that your little heart was full of revenge; and who can tell what you might do, if you had my ivory-headed cane?'

By this time the little boy's heart began to relent, and he soon gave up all thought of reeking his vengeance on his companion. It was near sun-down, and the hour for his retirement had come, and his mother took the opportunity of imparting to him some instruction, which I trust he will never forget as long as he lives.

'Before you say your prayers, my dear,' said Mrs. W., 'I want you seriously to reflect whether you can from your heart pray, 'Forgive me my trespasses, as I forgive those who trespass against me.' Suppose, my dear, that God should feel towards you, as you do towards William Johnson, would you be happy? Do not therefore pray, my son, I beseech you, that prayer, until you have most sincerely forgiven him."

'I see, mother,' said Frank, "that I ought not, and now my passion is over, I see I was very wicked in wanting that cane."

'I am glad to hear you say so, my child, and I hope you will be more careful hereafter, and not permit such evil temper to take possession of your soul. One good way to conquer our passions, is to think of our blessed Savior, especially when he was led from Gethsemane, and until he expired on the cross. You know he was spit upon, and buffeted, and crowned with thorns, and mocked, and reviled, and crucified as a malefactor; and yet we are told that 'He was led as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearer is dumb, so He opened not his mouth.' 'When he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not. His last prayer was for his murderers, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' If you will think of him, my son, it will aid you in getting the victory over your evil temper.

'I have a little story here which I thought would interest you, and I will read it for you, especially as the little boy was just of your age. I will give you the book, my son. It is the 'Assembly's Shorter Catechism, illustrated by appropriate anecdotes.''

'A poor African negro, only 10 years of age, went to hear the preaching of one of the missionaries, and became a convert to the Christian religion. His master—an inveterate enemy to missionaries—hearing of it, commanded him never to go again, and declared he would have him whipped to death if he did. The poor little boy, in consequence of the mandate, was very miserable. He could scarcely refrain from going, yet knew his death was inevitable if he did.

In this critical situation he sought direction and assistance at the throne of grace; and, after having done this, he felt convinced that it was his duty to attend, but to be careful that it should never interfere with his master's business—and for the rest, to leave himself in the hands of God.

He therefore went, and on his return, was summoned to his master's presence; and, after much violent and abusive language, received five and twenty lashes; and then, in a sarcastic tone of blasphemous ridicule, his master exclaimed,

'What can Jesus Christ do for you now?'

'He enables me to bear it patiently,' said the poor child.

'Give him five and twenty lashes more,' said the inhuman wretch.

He was obeyed.

'And what can Jesus do for you now?' asked the unfeeling monster.

'He helps me to look forward to a future reward,' replied the little sufferer.

'Give him five and twenty lashes more,' vociferated the cruel tyrant, in a transport of rage.

They complied; and while he listened with savage delight to the extorted groans of his dying victim, he again demands,

'What can Jesus do for you now?'

The youthful martyr, with the last effort of expiring nature, meekly answered,

'He enables me to pray for you, massa,' and instantly breathed his last.'

Frank's little heart broke with sympathy for the poor boy, and he promised his mother to try and imitate his spirit. You must, too, my dear children.

THE CHOICE.

'I shall not study any longer,' exclaimed Albert, carelessly throwing down his book, and overthrowing his chair, as he rose from the table. My father has given me permission to choose for myself, and I will no longer pore over these musty books.'

'What has discouraged you?' inquired Edmund, looking up, with anxiety, from the work which they had been diligently examining.

''Tis all study, study, study,' said the other. 'I'm sick of it. I'm sick of attending to one thing;' and he left the room without giving his companion time to expostulate.

Edmund continued in his course of study, and about a week after, he heard that his friend was engaged in the employment of an eminent merchant, and was delighted with his new business.

A year had not rolled away, when merchandize was more wearisome than books, and Albert had returned home to assist his father in the more humble labors of the farm.

But when Edmund was about to graduate from college, his former associate waited upon him, and detailed, in glowing colors, the magnificent prospects of wealth and grandeur which awaited him, in a land agency in which he was about to engage. This latter business called him out of the country, and Edmund lost sight of his friend for many years.

He had himself, in the meanwhile, in one almost unvaried track, and by toilsome perseverance, risen step by step, until he had established his reputation for learning and stability of character, and he now sat, honored and esteemed, among the judges of his native land.

Among the prisoners who were one day tried before him, was one with whose appearance he was particularly interested.—The name, however, was unknown to him, and he suppressed any further curiosity while he attended to the discharge of his official duty. The crime for which this prisoner was arraigned was forgery, and the circumstances of the case developed a long train of irregularities and vicious practices. As the trial proceeded, it was ascertained that the offender had, at different times, passed under various names, until it was now doubtful which of right belonged to him. Among others, Edmund at last recognized that of his old friend, and his feelings compelled him to avail himself of an early pretext to adjourn the court.

In the evening he waited upon Albert, and drew from him the history of his life. It was one of many changes, not unmarked by darker hues, and all were traced to the fatal privilege of choosing to change his employment, whenever it became for a time disagreeable to him. The guilty man appeared deeply penitent for his error; and although sentenced in course of law, was soon liberated by the exertions of his friend.

But alas! he was fitted for no regular employment, for he had not continued sufficiently long in any to become a proficient; and all his established habits seemed to conspire to prepare him for temptation, so that he soon relapsed into his former practices; and illustrated, by his miserable life, and more pitiable end, the fatal consequences of choosing, not that which is expedient, but that which is agreeable.—Bap. Advocate.

Christian Influence.

The effect of well-directed Christian effort can not be fully estimated. Efforts dictated by the benevolence of the gospel are sure to have effect. David, when full of zeal for the God of Israel, with his pebble and sling slew the giant of Gath. His confidence was in God, therefore God strengthened his arm and gave him the victory. So God will always do. The divine influence is sure to attend every effort made for the salvation of sinners by those who trust in God. God denies himself when he refuses to bestow his blessing upon his ordained means of grace.—This he can never do. Therefore every child of God may have great boldness in urging men to conform to the principles of our holy religion. It is as much impossible for the most confirmed infidel to resist entirely the influence of the pious christian, however feeble may be his intellect, and defective his knowledge, as to resist God. Sinners can not possibly remain unmoved when the excellence of the gospel is presented, because God has pledged himself, and it is his good pleasure to second by the energies of his holy spirit every effort made to reclaim men from sin.

"In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this, or that, or whether they be both alike good." A pious influence, though small at first, shall roll on, constantly increasing in magnitude and velocity till it shall overcome the combined forces of sin, and bring the world under the influence of the gospel. Every faithful child of God gives strength to this divine influence. Every conversion of a sinner gives it new force. Every heartfelt prayer, every seasonable admonition, every faithful rebuke, every well spoken word, help swell the tide of that influence which is to establish the peaceable reign of Christ.

There are some professors, (may their number never increase,) who profess they have no influence, and can do no good.—This is found to be a very comfortable excuse for inefficiency, and is like "the baseless fabric of a vision." No professor of religion can exert a good influence unless his conduct and profession agree. If this be the case, he can not be without his savory influence, and this single fact may give him an irresistible power, and make him an efficient instrument in bringing sinners to Christ. Harlan Page, who was a man of small mental endowments, but of ardent piety, was known to be the instrument in the conversion of many souls. His pious labors of love secured him an influence that seldom falls to the lot of stronger minds. It is every Christian's duty to make his influence as good and extensive as possible. And know this, that it will not cease with your life, but roll on increasing till time shall end.

Christian Hope.

The hope of salvation that the gospel ensures to all that love God, is to them an unfailing refuge. In all circumstances it is the stay and joy of their hearts. When enemies come in like a flood, and combine their energies for the overthrow of the christian, by whatever means they may, when detraction and slander are borne on the wings of the wind, to despoil him of his reputation and rob him of friends; when every possible effort is made to despoil him of his substance and blast all his earthly prospects, then his hope is like an anchor to his soul, and all their storms beat in vain on his bark; unruffled and secure he rides on the stormy billows, because in God is his hope and his inheritance. When pale disease asserts her power, turning the ruddy glow into deadly pallor, enfeebling the nerves, distracting the brain with all its concomitants of pain and anxiety, his hope is firm in God that if his earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, he has a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. No circumstances of time and place, natural or adventitious, can rob the pious soul of his hope and his reward. He rejoices in God, and feels perfectly secure while he sings his precious promise that

> "In every condition, in sickness, in health,
> In poverty's vale, or abounding in wealth,
> At home and abroad, on the land, on the sea,
> As thy days may demand, shall thy strength ever be.
>
> The soul that on Jesus has leaned for repose,
> I will not, I will not desert to his foes,
> That soul though all hell should endeavor to shake,
> I'll never, no never, no never forsake."

Do all our readers possess this hope? As many as have it, have all that they can have to make them rich, happy, and honorable. It is obtained by submission to God, and retained by obedience to his revealed will. It is vain to talk of a hope in God that can not be sustained by the fruits of holiness. The soul that is born of God, loves God and his requirements, and finds his pleasure in attending to the institutions of his house, and advancing the praise of his name. His hope is a lively hope. It gives him the life of faith in the son of God, and insures life eternal in heaven.—It is a good hope, because it shall abide the storms of life and death, and convey its passenger to the mansions of rest. It is a firm hope because it is founded on the immutable promise of Jehovah. The hope that is not accompanied with love and obedience to his law, is like the hope of the hypocrite, and it shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

Suppression of Licentiousness.

It has been suggested to us that some might think that the bill for the suppression of Licentiousness published in our last, was passed by our Legislature. It was not passed. But that, or some other that should make a penalty to the crime mentioned, a terror to evil doers, should be passed. We said the friends of Moral Purity had reason to be encouraged. Their numbers are constantly increasing, and the public mind begins to be somewhat excited on the subject. We can not see how parents possessing natural affection can be opposed to the consistent efforts that are made for the extirpation of impurity, and the protection of virtue. It would be an anomaly for brothers or sisters to willingly yield each other to the destroyer. It is no time for any friend of purity to be idle, though disgrace and sin may not have approached their domestic circle. The Destroyer is continually making inroads, blasting in their early bloom the fairest flowers of promise, and with it sending the keenest anguish to thousands of hearts. We say again to the friends of moral purity, do what you can in this heaven-born enterprise.

Removal.

Br. Varnum Hull has removed to Preston, to labor with the Church in that place. His correspondents will please address him at Oxford, Chenango co., N. Y.

Letter from Eld. S. M. Burdick.

Brother Bailey—Since revival intelligence is well accepted by all the friends of Zion's King, and to such it being a source of encouragement, therefore permit me to say, through your paper, which I esteem as a valuable medium of communication to our denomination, that prospects in our section of country of late have been somewhat cheering. I have recently baptized seven at Lincklaen, one at Otselic, and two at Preston; all of whom, excepting one, united with the church in their respective vicinities. One individual in the last mentioned place, was recently from Canada, and had never been acquainted with Seventh-day Baptists until she found them in Preston. But notwithstanding the trials it cost her in leaving the practice of parents and friends, she embraced the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, being convinced, that Christ, who said keep the commandments, is worthy of more love and regard, than our best earthly friends, or worldly convenience. She therefore united with the people "noted" for their singularity, and we pray God, we may yet be as much so for holiness and good works.

The interests of the Redeemer's kingdom, depend very much for advancement upon the right spirit and practice of those professing to be disciples of Christ, for those who are truly such, are justly said to be the "light of the world." Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his, and if the light which be in us be darkness, how great is that darkness!—Therefore, let us lay aside every thing calculated to obscure the glorious gospel light, and strive together with all our powers for the salvation of souls, for the unity of the spirit, and for the establishment of the truth, and may the knowledge of the Lord cover the whole earth.

Yours, in gospel bonds,

Journal of Br. S. S. Griswold.

Brother Bailey,—Again the wheels of time have rolled another month into eternity, admonishing me of my obligation to send another sketch of my journey and success.

March 31. Called upon Br. Gillett, and made arrangement to present the object of my Agency to his church and people.

April 1. Visited Br. A. D. Titsworth, and preached in the evening at Br. Asa Dunham's, to a solemn audience.

2. Sabbath; preached in the morning and afternoon at New Market church, and in the evening at Br. David Dunn's. During the day and evening we enjoyed a refreshing season. Delightful indeed it was to me to again revisit the place where I trust the Lord led me to the knowledge of his holy Sabbath. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

3. Preached at Samptown in the morning, where I was once a member. In the afternoon met the Piscataway church in their conference, and felt my heart to rejoice to see the love and union manifested. No jarring string made discord in their little band. All was peace and harmony.—And what an influence! Cemented by love they stand unmoved, while many churches are bleeding at every pore.—When will the churches of the Redeemer obey the commandment, "Love one another." Organized a Missionary Society auxilliary to the A. S. D. B. Missionary Society. The brethren here take a deep interest in the spread of the gospel. Much depends upon the ministry, whether churches consider the cause of Missions of much importance or not. And I think it a fact abundantly proved, that those churches who give most for Missions, are the most liberal in the support of their Pastors.

4. Preached in the evening at Br. Jonathan R. Dunham's. This dear brother has been long afflicted with a disease called the black leprosy. But his soul is stayed on God, and he looks beyond this life for a termination of his pains.

5. Attended an union meeting of ministers of East Jersey. Sermon by Elder Sym of Newark. A most sublime and heavenly discourse. This Elder baptized me while residing in Newark. The meeting was held in the New Market meeting-house. In the afternoon I was requested to set in conference with the ministering brethren, when the sermon underwent a critical examination, after which an Essay on the origin and nature of the deacon's office, which also passed under the same review, each one commenting upon it as he thought proper. Much good I think might result from such meetings. Visited our aged brother Joel Dunn, and his wife, probably the oldest observer of the Sabbath in America, being 95, and his wife 89 years of age; yet he is able to attend church, and walk a mile or two at a time. Talking with him is like holding converse with ages past. In 1788 he felled the first tree on the place now occupied by the city of Frankfort, in Kentucky, and assisted in laying out that town. He has always observed the Sabbath, as also his father, grand, and great-grand-father did before him. How pleasing to reflect, that during such a long period of past years, this family, like Noah of old, have held fast their integrity amidst a wicked and Sabbath-disregarding world. For 70 years this brother and sister have been united by the marriage vow, being cheered by a bright hope of soon being re-united where their Sabbath ne'er shall end. Standing in his door, he can point to here and there a spot near his dwelling once stained with the crimson blood of the enemies of America, which are still hallowed as being sacred to the memory of the sons of Liberty. How costly the sacrifice to purchase what we now enjoy. Although pleasing, it is melancholy to converse with those who were companions of a Washington, an Adams, and a Franklin. In the rear of his house the cliff of Washington rock rears its honored head, from which lofty eminence the Father of his country stood and viewed the armies of proud Britain's Isle, stretched like grasshoppers on the plain below. Peace to the names of our departed chiefs, and bliss to their survivors in arms.

8. Went to Plainfield, and had a season of prayer at Br. Wm. Dunn's, in the evening.

9. Sabbath; preached in the morning for Br. Crandall, and in the afternoon, had a review of the 2d chapter of 2d Cor. In the evening preached a Missionary sermon, which was followed by an address from Br. G. B. Utter, of New-York.

10. In the morning attended service in the first-day Baptist church in Plainfield, where the Lord is pouring out his Spirit in a powerful manner under the labors of Br. W. B. Gillett and Barker. Christians are praying, ministe are preaching, sinners are weeping, con erts rejoicing, and stereotyped means are vanishing like the dew before the morning sun.

In the afternoon formed a Missionary Society in Plainfield church, and in the evening preached at Brooklyn, a few miles south, where I once resided, in a house jammed full. Much solemnity pervaded.

11. Attended a meeting of the anxious in the afternoon, and in the evening a Temperance meeting in the S. D. B. church.—Tee-totalism is triumphant here, and King Alcohol is defeated. The cold water banner now floats proudly on the breeze.

15. Preached the preparatory sermon to the communion at New Market, and in the evening preached again at Br. A. D. Titsworth's.

16. Sabbath; preached at New Market, and administered the Lord's Supper to the two churches, who united. Oh how lovely to see these sister churches thus living in perfect harmony. Solemnity pervaded the house while many tears coursed their way down the cheek. In the afternoon preached at Newtown school house, and in the evening gave a farewell sermon at sister Rachel Randolph's.

17. Arrived at Br. Thomas B. Stillman's in New-York. Here I found our little band stemming the torrent of public opinion, which sets hard against them. Having planted their feet on the truth of God, they stand like the rock in the ocean. They manifested an ardent desire for the prosperity of the Mission cause by contributing liberally for its advance, (the best evidence of any, by the way.) They also are laboring hard to usher into the world Tracts, which will sustain our particular views of truth, which I think to be an excellent, and perhaps the best way of spreading the truth of the holy Sabbath before the church and the world at large. And permit me here to state that I cannot but hope that our churches will cheerfully respond to the urgent appeal of the Gen. Agent to enable him to carry out the wishes of the Tract Society. Beloved brethren will you awake? Let not this call remain unanswered. Oh, let us come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty array of error which has flooded our world. Freely we have received; freely give. Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. The harvest is white—the Macedonian cry has come; let not the cause of truth retrograde for lack of money. Brethren! pay up your interest money which is now due the Lord Jesus Christ; keep it not back, lest the principal take wings and fly away.

21. Left New-York. Distributed Tracts along the way as usual, and held several interesting conversations with individuals, as opportunity offered.

23. Sabbath; spent the day in a private room in New Haven; found much consolation in reading the life of Jesus Christ, and reflecting that I was in the path of obedience. After the Sabbath was past, rode 15 miles to my father's; arrived about midnight, and was again welcomed under the paternal roof.

24. Attended service in my native town, and once again listened to the gospel in the place where I trust the Lord called me from darkness to light.

27. Preached, by the request of friends, in the school house in my father's neighborhood to a crowded house. Much feeling pervaded the assembly. After the sermon, I gave a relation of the change that had taken place in my views of divine truth, viz., Baptism and the Sabbath. All listened with attention, while I urged to an investigation of the scriptures. May the Lord bless the feeble efforts of his unworthy servant.

29. Arrived at Waterford, Conn., called on Elder Rogers, and felt to rejoice that I was permitted to see my brethren in the flesh.

Since my last report, I have received, and secured to be paid before the first of Sept. $71,57, viz., $44,62 from the Piscataway Missionary Society, $10,75 from the Plainfield Missionary Society, and $4,80, Interest on Notes, and $12, from the brethren in New-York. Brethren, follow your contributions with your prayers.

News of the Day.

The Areaulite.—A New Invention.—This is a new instrument of most ingenious invention, and of great importance to science. The purpose it is intended for is to ascertain, to a mathematical certainty, the area of any irregular, given surface, or the square of a circle. It is of material use to surveyors, who, by means of it, can ascertain the exact contents of any given plot, no matter how irregular. It is ascertaining the surface upon the known principles of ascertaining solids. We have all heard of giving the number of cubic inches in a handful of brush, by placing the same in water, and measuring the amount displaced. This instrument acts upon the same principle in regard to surfaces. It consists of two plates of glass, of very even and regular surfaces, plated together in a frame, so close as to admit only a piece of common drawing paper between them. It is of a rectangular form and closed on three sides, the fourth being open to admit a given amount of quicksilver.—The area within the frame, occupied by the quicksilver, is then ascertained. The plot correctly cut out on the paper is then introduced, and the space between the glass plates being no greater than the thickness of the paper, the quicksilver is displaced, as water would be in a vessel in which any solid is introduced. The area now occupied by the quicksilver, with the plot in its midst, is measured and ascertained, and the difference between this and that occupied by the quicksilver alone, gives the exact area of the plot.

It is the invention of Dr. Thomas Wood, of Smithfield, Jefferson Co., Ohio, who has secured his invention by patent. It was adopted by the Legislature of Ohio, for the State Surveyors. The Franklin Institute, of Penn., have presented a medal to Dr. Wood for his invention, after a careful examination of the instrument, to which they give, in a certificate, the most unqualified recommendation. It is one of those simple inventions that strikes you at once, and, founded as all simple inventions are, upon the principles of truth, produces admiration and conviction at first sight.—Pittsburg Daily Amer.

Important, if true.—We learn from Canada, through sources entitled to high consideration, that there is a strong probability that an amnesty will be granted by Queen Victoria, to all who were engaged in the insurrectionary movements in the British American Provinces. If this shall prove to be correct, it will tend more to tranquilize this frontier than any other act which her majesty has sanctioned since her coronation.

Executive Temperance Society.—A copy of the annexed circular, we understand, has been addressed to every person connected with the Executive Department at Washington:

Washington, April 6, 1842.

Sir:—At a meeting of the Total Abstinence Society of the several civil executive departments of the National Government, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That a copy of the pledge of this Society, with these resolutions, and the accompanying letter, be printed, and sent by the Corresponding Secretary to each member of the civil executive departments, inviting them to add their names as members of this Society.

Resolved, That the families of the members of the civil executive departments be also invited to join this Society.

In carrying into effect the above resolutions, permit me, in behalf of this Society, to solicit your co-operation in a cause so allied to the health, prosperity, and happiness of this whole nation.

The people in all parts of the land are rising in the strength of their combined determination to rescue themselves and their country from the dreadful thraldom of a vice too common alike to the poor and the rich.

Within the past year multitudes have utterly forsaken this destroyer of human happiness; homes that were worse than desolate, have been cheered by the return of husbands, fathers, and sons, to add the blessings of industry, kindness, and love to the almost broken-hearted wives, daughters, and sisters, who have felt the stern oppression of this source of crime and of every evil. It has crept in upon us under the guise of a friend, and we have been insensible of our danger till it has insiduously established its empire over the whole length and breadth of our land.

The eyes of the community have at last been opened to see the ruin and the remedy, and the call is made from every quarter upon every one who claims to be a patriot, to give the strength of his example and influence to a cause which appeals so earnestly and so undeniably to his sympathies, and one which is so entirely practicable of complete success.

The Executive, with the highest judicial officers, and many of the members of the Legislatures in several of the States have already given their names to a similar pledge with that now offered to your consideration, and the evidence is too plain to be mistaken that the heart of the people is in this great movement, and that its triumph is certain. The evil to be removed is one of immense magnitude, the remedy is a simple and sure one, and the sacrifice demanded is comparatively trifling.

We trust, then, that we shall not ask in vain for the expression of your approbation and your hearty co-operation.

With great respect, your ob't servant,

Corresponding Secretary.

The following is the pledge of the Society to which your signature, and the signatures of your family are requested, and if signed, to be returned to the Corresponding Secretary:

We, the undersigned, pledge ourselves not to use intoxicating drinks as a beverage, nor to traffic in them; and in all suitable ways to discountenance their use throughout the community.

More Repudiation.—The Governor of Michigan has issued, in date of the 27th ult., a proclamation to the effect that the Auditor General and State Treasurer, having made out an estimate of the damage sustained by the State from the failure of the contracting parties, with whom were negotiated the State loans, to pay the installments remaining unpaid; and it appearing, after deducting from the amount of the loans the said estimate of damages, that there is due from the State of Michigan to the holders of her bonds the sum of $2,342,960 24, he, the Governor, therefore requires the holders of bonds to deliver to the State Treasurer bonds to the amount of $2,857,039 76, being the amount now outstanding for which no consideration has been received by the State, in order that they may be cancelled; or, if they prefer it, they may return the whole amount of bonds issued, and receive in return new bonds to the amount of $2,342,960 24; in other words, the State has issued bonds to the amount of $5,200,000, for which it is only willing to acknowledge an indebtedness of $2,342,960 24.

Comment on a proceeding so atrocious as this, would be superfluous. It shocks the moral sense as much as it destroys all confidence in public faith.—Courier & Enquirer.

State Prison Law.—The Albany Journal publishes the act in relation to convict labor in the State prisons, passed on the 9th ult. It contains ten sections, and directs that the Court in which any accused person shall be convicted of an offense punishable in a State prison, shall ascertain whether he has learned and practiced any mechanical trade; and if so a certificate of the fact is to be delivered with the convict to the keeper of the prison.

No convict shall be permitted to work at any other trade than the one specified in such certificate, or the making of articles the chief supply of which are imported from foreign countries.

No contract for the service of convicts shall be made for a longer term than six months, by the agent, without the consent of the inspectors, at a regular meeting of the board. Two months notice of the time and place of letting contracts must be given in the State paper and in one newspaper published in each city of the State; such notice to specify the business in which the convicts are to be employed, the time for which their services are to be let, not exceeding five years, and the number of convicts. In all branches of business the chief supply of which is not from foreign countries, the number of convicts shall be limited by the number who had learned the trade specified in the contracts.

Existing lawful contracts may be completed, notwithstanding the provision of this act.

The inspectors of the prisons must transmit to the Attorney General, on or before the 1st of June next, a copy of every contract for convict labor in their possession. Contracts which he shall certify to be in violation of existing laws, shall be rescinded on the 1st of May, 1843.

Inspectors or agents, or other prison officers, letting the services of a convict contrary to law, or consenting thereto, to be punished with fine or imprisonment and forfeiture of office.

The seventh section provides for the trial of officers violating this law.

The eighth directs the appointment of a commissioner, whose duty it shall be to ascertain if mining or smelting operations can be profitably carried on upon any of the lands owned by the State—or if not, upon what terms a small tract of mineral land can be bought for that purpose. Also, to ascertain the expense over and above the surplus earning of all the State prison convicts for two years, to remove to said tract five hundred of the prisoners confined in the prisons of this State, and the probable expense of building a prison for their safe keeping and accommodation, and generally the expediency of employing said convicts in such operations of mining and smelting.

The following is an extract of a letter from an officer on board the sloop of war "Cyane," dated,

Valparaiso, Jan. 30, 1842.

"This ship is far superior to any other ship. I look upon her as a perfect model,—she sails better, works better, is easier in a sea way, and steers better than any other I know of; she sails like a fish, and rides the sea like a bird. We are all in love with her, and I defy any naval architect to produce her equal. We have tried her in strong winds and in light winds—in smooth water and a heavy sea—and as yet, we cannot think of any improvement. I wish I could find language to praise her as she ought to be praised. She was built at the Charleston yard by Barker, the constructor, and I wish he could know what we think of her."

We understand that the two British officers, who crossed the line, near Detroit, and fired at each other ten times without hitting, have been severely reprimanded by their superior. He thinks it a burning shame that so much of her Majesty's saltpetre should be wasted on the eve of a probable war with the United States.—Louisville Journal.

Florida a State.—We stop the press to announce the interesting intelligence that we are assured that the Committee appointed by the State Convention have decided to issue immediately writs of Election for State Officers! Thus organizing at once a State Government for Florida, under the St. Joseph Constitution.—Florida Star.

A Bridegroom Killed.—Mr. John B. Davis, of Danville, Illinois, riding out on the 16th ult., was thrown from his horse and his neck was broken. He was to have been married next day, and the clergyman who had been requested to attend the ceremonies of the wedding, attended the services of the funeral on that day. A sad change from the bridal bed to the grave.

Some one, with more truth than poetry, has remarked that the difference between a great rascal and a small one is only this; the former goes to Europe or Texas, the latter to the penitentiary.—New Bedford Register.

It is said that the Encke comet is now visible to the naked eye.

From the Ithaca Journal.

A Fearful Ride.—The Ithaca and Owego rail road, as it comes into this village, descends in less than half a mile nearly 500 feet by means of two inclined planes. The cars on their arrival at the upper engine house are detached from the locomotive and permitted to descend to the lower engine house under the control of brakes. From the lower engine house, which is at the top of the first inclined plane, the passengers are brought to this village by stage. This is done because of the great steepness of the lower inclined plane; it descending 450 feet in the distance of 1750, or, nearly at an angle of 45 degrees to the horizon. No person of sane mind would venture his neck by going down this inclined plane, as in case of the car becoming detached in descending, it would inevitably be dashed into atoms.

On Saturday last the car containing eleven passengers, was detached as usual at the upper engine house, but it was found that the brakes did not operate, and that the car was hastening with constantly accelerated rapidity towards the brink of the lower inclined plane. The forward brakeman leaped from the car for the purpose of throwing it off the track by means of a beam, but he stumbled and failed in his object. The other brakeman sat at his post like a hero, calling to the passengers to jump and save themselves. On went the car with dreadful rapidity, and one by one the passengers threw themselves out.

The Hon. Amasa Dana leaped from the car as it passed through the lower engine house, and there also the brakeman sprang for his life. One man alone was unable to escape before the car, which was already outstripping the wind, made the plunge down the lower plane. The whole length of this was traversed almost in an instant. About 100 feet from the bottom the car left the track, dashing to pieces the iron wheels on which the engine rope plays, and splintering the beams which bound the tracks together, until it reached the foot of the plane, where it was dashed into a thousand fragments. One of the car wheels was shivered to pieces, the heavy iron axle-tree broken and scarcely any one piece of the body left entire.

We saw the wreck, and if a bomb shell had burst in the car it could not have more completely demolished it. In the midst of the fragments the man who descended with the car was found, his arm broken above and below the elbow, and his head severely fractured. Medical assistance was at once rendered, and there is some hope of his recovery. His name is Babcock, and he is a relative of Mr. Eber Babcock, of this village. During the delirium occasioned by the blow, the wounded man kept constantly repeating words as if endeavoring to stop a team of horses.

Judge Dana was but slightly hurt, although several of the passengers who sprang from the car were severely but not dangerously injured.

Mr. B., whose escape with life is little short of a miracle, was at the time our paper went to press, gradually improving, and confident hopes are entertained of his recovery.

CASE OF BENJAMIN RATHBUN.

By the letter below it will be seen that Governor Seward has again refused to exercise the pardoning power in favor of Benjamin Rathbun.

No more delicate duty devolves upon the Executive than that of a just and discriminative exercise of that power. He holds it as the conservator of the rights of the community and the convict, and the responsibility thrown upon him is often immense, and of the most painful character. As the impersonation of the principle of justice in the most extensive sense, he is bound to suppress all those sympathies in which others feel at liberty to indulge, or yield to them only so far as they are not incompatible with the reverence due to the majesty of the offended laws. The decision of Gov. Seward in the case of Rathbun, will, we think, upon cool reflection, command the approbation of every good citizen:

Buffalo, May 9, 1842.

To the Editors of the Com. Advertiser:

Gent.—I send you the enclosed communication just received from Gov. Seward, without comment, which I think should be made public by an insertion in your paper.

S. S. CASE.

Executive Department,
Albany, May 5, 1842.

Several respectable citizens, some of whom reside in Buffalo, and others in Batavia, together with more than fifty members of the Legislature, representing various parts of the state, have united in expressing a wish that I would reconsider my decision made in May, 1840, denying an application for pardon to Benjamin Rathbun.

The petitioners admit that that application was premature, and that the grounds upon which it was denied were satisfactory; but they express a hope that time may have wrought such a change in the circumstances of the case, as to permit the prisoner's release consistently with the public welfare. Time often produces such a change of circumstances as is thus supposed, and such a result would be exceedingly agreeable to me in the present case.

It will be remembered that it appeared when the application was considered, that the prisoner [illegible] been many years engaged in [illegible] transactions, banking, building, common carrying, and in purchasing, improving and selling real estate, in which multifarious business he had employed for a long time two thousand laborers, besides [illegible] hundred agents, assistants, cartmen and [illegible]—had the control of several Banks, and [illegible] financial agents in Buffalo and New York, that his daily payments [illegible] the thousand dollars, [illegible] vast financial operations affected the money market throughout the whole country; that these extensive financial operations were for a long time carried on by means of a skilfully organized system for executing and putting into market forged checks, notes and bills of exchange purporting to charge more than twelve persons of large estates and credit, and in fact drawing all their credit into requisition to sustain the prisoner's embarrassed fortune at the expense of citizens who reposed confidence in the integrity of the prisoner, and the financial ability of the persons whose signatures were thus fraudulently used.

So extensive was this system, and so perfect its management, that the prisoner was unable to distinguish the spurious paper from that which was genuine without referring to private marks and memoranda. When the discovery of the crimes took place it was found that forged paper representing more than a million and a half of dollars was in circulation, and this was less than a third of the whole amount for which false paper had been issued by the prisoner.

It appeared also on the previous examination of the case, that the prisoner, if he did not initiate his younger brother and his two nephews into this scheme of wickedness, at least unhesitatingly encouraged them in it for a long time for his exclusive benefit, and that when the exposure took place, he unjustly endeavored to make them responsible for all the forgeries, and to secure his acquittal upon the ground of his entire ignorance of those transactions.

It appeared farther that at least six indictments were pending against the prisoner, and that he was exposed to similar prosecutions to an unlimited extent. Yet the prisoner was only once convicted, and was held to answer to the laws of his country for only one of such a multitude of high offences.

Under these circumstances it was concluded that the selection of Benjamin Rathbun to be a recipient of Executive clemency, would have an injurious effect by impairing the public confidence in the firm and equal administration of justice. The high excitement under which the prisoner labored during the period when his offense was committed, his previous good character, his enterprising disposition and his great public usefulness; the deep affliction of his family and relatives, and the sympathy of his fellow citizens were all considered; but they seemed insufficient to justify the interposition of the Executive department in his behalf. The chief features of the case remain unchanged, and unhappily can never be forgotten, and I am obliged, therefore, to conclude that the decision before made ought not to be reversed.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The Honorable Mr. Case, of the Assembly, Buffalo.

Correspondence of the N. Y. American.

Washington, May 8.

More cause of quarrel in the case of Stanley and Wise. Yesterday both went to the race-course, and at the close of the races it happened, very unfortunately, that both of them mounted their horses to return at the same moment, and near the same place. Starting off together, before they could separate to find more congenial company, a large puddle in the middle of the road compelled them to approximate, just after a carriage had passed between them, at which Stanley's horse, a very clumsy, awkward draught horse, suddenly shied, before his rider could check him, and ran against Wise's horse; so that the legs of both the riders were brought in collision, and thrown out of the stirrup on that side.

Stanley's horse shot ahead, but was checked by his rider, who was just turning to apologize to Wise for the unintentional collision, when he received a blow on the right side of his head just above the temple, from Wise, who struck him from behind, with a heavy lead ball mounted on the end of a rattan,—a very fashionable weapon here. For a few moments, Stanley was so stunned as to be almost blinded, and he with difficulty recovered his senses, and then but imperfectly. He had no weapon whatever, not even a riding whip or stick, though it is evident that Wise came prepared to take advantage of any convenient opportunity for an assault.

Stanley, partially recovering his senses, said, "you have done a cowardly act, in striking me a blow from behind my back while I was unarmed. The collision of our horses was unintentional on my part, and I was about to say so to you when you assaulted me." Wise answered, "I called you a coward the other day in the House, and now I have struck you. If you can put up with that, do so." The rush of a crowd of people upon them prevented any blows from passing, which would have been difficult even without an interference, as both of them were on horseback.

Wise evidently had been determined to force a challenge from Stanley all this week; and he has probably succeeded. It is now generally believed that murder will come of it, in the usual forms of "chivalry."

The facts in the case, I have from the testimony of a gentleman who was approaching at the moment to converse with Wise. The statement may be depended on.

Congress has made an appropriation of $500,000 to build a floating Battery of iron, intended for the defence of New York harbor.

Treasure found.—We are credibly informed that a few days since, a respectable citizen of Newton, in digging near his dwelling, struck upon a large metal pot, containing about $8,000 in gold and silver. The money was in doubloons, old English guineas, and other gold, etc. It is supposed to have been buried in the time of the revolution, about the period of the battle of Newton.—Flushing Journal.

Death by Lightning.—In the southwestern part of Brookfield, on the place lately owned and occupied by Dr. Usher, on Wednesday last, about 10 o'clock, A. M., a man by the name of Handy was at work with a boy ten years old in the field, when a slight shower of rain come up, and they ran to a small hay barn that stood in the lot, and sat down together near the door.—They had not sat there long when the electric fluid dropped from the cloud over them, which was a very thin one and from which but very little rain fell, and passed down a post of the barn, riving it into shivers, and struck Mr. H. and killed him instantly.—The only mark of violence about him was a slight mark upon his head, and a small hole in his hat. The boy was not hurt.

It may be of service to some one to know, that many persons, struck apparently dead by an electric shock, have been restored by pouring cold water upon them.—Hamilton Palladium.

Ohio.—A gentleman in Ohio, writing in the Boston Courier, says:

Ohio is now forty two years of age, and has a population of more than a million and a half. The increase of her population and business has no parallel in the history of the world. The quantity of land in this state is over 25,000,000 of acres, and not more than 7,500,000 acres under cultivation. There is but very little waste land in Ohio. Almost every acre can be brought under a state of cultivation. And most of the land is rich and productive.—The estimated value of real property in 1840, was $350,000,000; personal property, $124,600,000. There are within the limits of the state 914 miles of navigable canals, 793 of which is owned by the state, and in the remainder the state has an interest. The canals are finished—turnpike roads, in which the state has an interest, cost about $20,000,000. In 1840, the taxaple property in the state was returned at 126,102,706, about one half of the actual value. The value of Ohio products exported in 1840, was $19,670,981; of that sum, $7,098,810 was for bread stuff, mostly for wheat flour. Manufactured articles, $4,000,000; and of other products including pork, lard, butter, cheese, animals driven from the state on foot, mines and forests, $7,572,171.

Failures of Distilleries.—In view of the fact, no doubt, that in this vicinity we hear almost daily of the failure of some distillery, or the closing of some tavern, we are asked by a respectable man, "Why do you prosecute your cause so vigorously when you see it ruining your neighbor's business?" Such a question as this under some circumstances, would be a poser. If we were fighting dry good's men, hardware men, mechanics, farmers, or any whose calling is consistent with good order and productive of happiness, we should be obliged to confess ourselves misanthropes. As it is, we reply, we have the same right to carry on the war of extermination against the making of ardent spirits as a beverage, that we have to oppose the strides of a man travelling through the land scattering an infectious disease or the plague. Because a man has chosen a bad business for his business, is no reason he should be left peaceably to pursue it. Were it otherwise there are many nefarious operations which could be justified. There are professed gamblers, and swindlers, and shaves in the land, either of whom could claim protection under the plea that such was their business, and such being the case, moral men must have their hands tied and their mouths muzzled. Pshaw, this is too ridiculous for men in their senses.

But we have no ill will for men engaged in the making, vending, or selling to be drank, ardent spirits. We wish them well, but their business we must and do cry out against. Our main—more appropriate business is and should be, to persuade men not to drink.—Utica Washingtonian.

No wonder—no wonder.—At the sale of the splendid furniture of a bankrupt who paid as much as fifty per cent on his debts, the auctioneer, in selling a suit of window curtains, said, "Ladies and gentlemen, if the fringe on these curtains did not cost forty dollars a yard, it is no sale." Is it surprising that with such extravagance we have so many bankrupts? The furniture of the house cost twelve thousand dollars, a barouche and horses sixteen hundred, the rent of the house twelve hundred per annum, the annual support of the whole establishment about seven thousand dollars!

Here we have the other fifty per cent of the bankrupt's effects. Had he lived like a prudent, reasonable man, he never would have been on the bankrupt list. A good wife should always say to her husband, "Go to no expense which your profits in business will not permit; let us live in two rooms and pay our way rather than splendid misery." We commisserate the condition of a woman of feeling and sensibilty, who sees the auctioneer walk into the house and knock down and carry off all her furniture and comforts; but a sensible woman looks into these affairs herself, and will not allow her husband to make sacrifices on her account. More rich furniture has been sold this spring than on any former occasion. The reform is in progress—"keep the ball in motion."—N. Y. Daily Sun.

Mysterious.—The body of a female apparently about 16 or 18 years of age, was found on the 17th, on Gull Island, at the mouth of Grand River, Canada, from the marks of violence and blood on one of her hands, no doubt is entertained that a most foul act had been perpetrated and murder committed; when found, the body was destitute of all wearing apparel except an elegant lace cap, tied with a pink ribbon, and a pair of flesh colored silk stockings, and was wrapped in a piece of old sail cloth. Four boards had been nailed together to serve as a sort of coffin, and the body thus prepared had been hastily buried a few inches below the surface of the sand, and was discovered by some boys who being attracted by the boards sticking up, endeavored to remove it for the purpose of carrying it home. It could have been there but a very short time before its discovery, as no decomposition had begun to take place. The features are represented as beautiful, and the hair as light or auburn color. No coroner's inquest had been held when our informant left.—Buffalo Economist of Saturday.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. Dellay, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers, to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. Every stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25, those wishing to vote by proxy, can do so, by forwarding their votes to some one of the stockholders; naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting also their number of shares.

☞ IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their
PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the [illegible]. Address, post paid, La Roy Sun[illegible] 126 Fulton street, New-York.

POETRY.

From the Morning Star.

The Jewish Pilgrim.

Are these the ancient, holy hills
Where Angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story fills
With glory not yet cold?
For I have passed by many a shrine,
O'er many a land and sea,
But still, oh! promised Palestine,
My dreams have been of thee.

I see thy mountain cedars green,
Thy valleys fresh and fair,
With summer's bright as they have been
When Israel's home was there;
Though o'er the sword and time have past,
And Cross the Crescent shone,
And heavily the chain hath prest,
But thou art still our own!

Thine are the wandering race that go
Unblest through every land,
Whose blood hath stained the polar snow,
And quenched the desert sand;
And thine the homeless hearts that turn
From all earth's shrines to thee,
With their lone faith for ages borne
In sleepless memory.

For thrones are fallen, and nations gone,
Before the march of time,
And where the ocean rolled alone
And forests in their prime,
Since Gentile ploughshares marred the brow
Of Zion's holy hill---
Where are the Roman eagles now?
Yet Judah wanders still.

And has she wandered thus in vain
A pilgrim of the past?
No! long deferred her hope hath been,
But it shall come at last;
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
As from some prophet's urn,
It bids the nations build not there,
For Jacob shall return.

Oh! lost and loved Jerusalem,
Thy pilgrim may not stay,
To see the glad earth's harvest home
In thy redeeming day;
But now resigned in faith and trust,
I seek a nameless tomb,
At least beneath the hollowed dust
Oh! give the wanderer room.

Sonnet.

There is a bright but pensive eye,
That ever on my pathway shines;
As like unto some star on high,
That mildly beams when eve declines.

There is a voice I love to hear,
Whose music binds me like a spell,
And like that spell, it is as dear
As on my ear when first it fell.

THE DUTY OF THE YOUNG MEN OF THE PRESENT DAY.

BY P. H. AGAN.

It needs but a very superficial knowledge of the past history of the world to convince the mind, that the principal cause of all the evils, moral, political, and religious, which have afflicted the human family, is to be found in, or traced directly to, the ignorance of the great mass of the people.

If this be true, as most persons will readily admit, there is a great degree of responsibility resting upon those who live at the present day; but more especially does this remark apply to the young men of this country, those who are just entering upon the active duties of life, and who are to guide for good or evil the destinies of millions.

There is no country upon the earth of the same extent, which in every point of view, offers as strong inducements to intellectual and moral cultivation as the United States. A free and untrammeled public press, and liberty with all its attendant blessings are ours; and if under these favorable and auspicious circumstances, the great subject of education is neglected, we are criminally negligent of a sacred duty which the Creator in the very nature of things, has plainly marked out for us to pursue.

In tracing the history of the ancient republics, it will be observed, that as a general thing the improvement of the mind did not form a part of the education of the people, and to render them unfit to discharge the ordinary duties of citizens, or to manage the affairs of state; and accordingly we see in their mistaken and false system of education, a fruitful source of their ruin.

We learn then, from the history of mankind thus far, as also by every day's experience, that it is absolutely necessary that the people of this country should be educated, certainly to that degree, that they may comprehend fully the principles, powers and operations of government, in order that they may be enabled to discharge the important political duties, which are imposed upon them by their institutions.

It is a self-evident truth that mankind cannot from their very organization, remain stationary in regard to their improvement of their mental faculties—that they must be continually advancing or receding in the scale of intelligence. This is abundantly proven by the history of every nation.—This fact should call forth the best and noblest energies of the young men of America in the cause of education. This, the only experiment of a government based upon the intelligence of the people, has been tried and thus far, it has more than realized the fondest expectations of those who were instrumental in its formation but it can only be sustained by the same causes which operated to bring it into existence. If immortality, vice and ignorance usurp the places of intelligence, morality and virtue then the people of America may bid an eternal farewell to their liberties. Upon this point the history of man and his institutions, teaches us a lesson which is full of instruction—a lesson, which should never be forgotten. We have seen Greece and Rome in the pride of their youth, in all the vigor and strength of their manhood, noble, even in their decline, and calm as in the composure of death; and will it become the duty of the future historian, to record the same of America and her institutions? This important question rests with the young men of our country; but, judging from the noble stand which they are now taking in regard to this matter it could not be entrusted to better hands.

Since the art of printing was discovered, general knowledge has increased to a great extent, in consequence of the cheapness of books; but have virtue and morality, and consequently, the happiness of mankind increased in the same ratio? Evidently, not; and for the obvious reason that education has not been directed so as to apply to the practical concerns of life. Now the correction of any evils which have flowed from a false and mistaken system of education, is left with the people, and upon them rests the responsible and important duty of pursuing a course which will be calculated to eradicate those evils and to place knowledge and education upon a firm and solid basis, so that it may produce the happiest results, both for the present, and all future generations,

"Till himself shall die."

In the hands of the young men of our land is placed this sacred and important trust; and they owe it to themselves as citizens of America—as the countrymen of Washington, Jefferson and Franklin—as they value the institutions which secure to them "life liberty and happiness"—to take care that they execute it faithfully.

But the course which the young men of New York are now pursuing, shows that this trust has not been placed in unworthy hands—that they are not unwilling to take their share of the responsibility. They are, as it were, the pioneers in the system which they have adopted, in order to effect the object, and consequently their course is watched with intense anxiety by their brethren of other parts of the country.—From the mountains, vallies, and rock-bound shores of New-England, from the sunny plains of the far south, from the broad, and fertile prairies of the boundless west; one universal sentiment only is expressed, calling upon them to pursue the noble course which they have taken, to ameliorate and inprove the condition of mankind.

Liverpool, April, 1842.

The following extract from the late speech of John Quincy Adams in the House of Representatives, presents some interesting views of that gentleman on the subject of slavery:

"What I say is involuntary, because the subject has been brought into the House from another quarter, as the gentlemen himself admits. I would leave that institution to the exclusive consideration and management of the States more peculiarly interested in it, just as long as they can keep it within their own bounds. So far I admit that Congress has no power to meddle with it. As long as they do not step out of their own bounds, and do not put the question to the people of the United States, whose peace, welfare, and happiness are all at stake, so long I will agree to leave them to themselves. But when a member from a free State brings forward certain resolutions, for which, instead of reasoning to disprove his positions, you vote a censure upon him, and that without hearing, it is quite another affair.

At the time this was done, I said that, as far as I could understand the resolutions proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Giddings) there were some of them for which I was ready to vote, and some which I must vote against; and I will now tell this House, my constituents, and the world of mankind, that the resolution against which I have voted, was that in which he declares that what are called the slave states, have the exclusive right of consultation on the subject of slavery. For that resolution I never would vote, because I believe that it is not just, and does not contain constitutional doctrine. I believe that long as slave states are able to sustain their institutions without going abroad or calling upon other parts of the Union to aid them or act on the subject, so long I will consent never to interfere. I have said this, and I repeat it; but if they come to the free states and say to them—You must help us to keep down our slaves, you must aid us in an insurrection and a civil war, then I say, that with that call comes a full and plenary power to this House and to the Senate over the whole subject. It is a war power. I say it is a war power; and when your country is actually in war, whether it be a war of invasion or a war of insurrection, Congress has power to carry on the war, and must carry it on according to the laws of war; and by the laws of war an invaded country has all its laws and municipal institutions swept by the board, and martial law takes the place of them.

This power in Congress has, perhaps, never been called into exercise under the present Constitution of the United States. But when the laws of war are in force, what, I ask, is one of those laws? It is this! that when a country is invaded, and two hostile armies are set in martial array, the commanders of both armies have power to emancipate all the slaves in the invaded territory. Nor is this a mere theoretical statement. The history of South America shows that the doctrine has been carried into practical execution within the last thirty years. Slavery was abolished in Columbia, first, by the Spanish General Murillo, and, secondly, by the American General Bolivar. It was asbolished by virtue of a military command given at the head of the hostile army, and its abolition continues to be law to this day. It was abolished by the laws of war, and not by municipal enactments the power was exercised by military commanders, under instructions, of course, from their respective Governments. And here I recur again to the example of Gen. Jackson.—What are you now about in Congress?

You are about passing a grant to refund to Gen. Jackson the amount of a certain fine imposed upon him by a Judge under the laws of the State of Louisiana. You are going to refund him the money, with interest; and this you are going to do because the imposition of the fine was unjust. And why was it unjust? Because Gen. Jackson was acting under the laws of war, and because the moment you place a military commander in a district which is the theatre of war, the laws of war apply to that district. I have a correspondence between Gen. Jaskson, and the Governor of Georgia during the Seminole campaign, in which Gen. Jackson, addressing Gov. Rathbun, asserted the principle that he, as Governor of a State within his (Gen. J's) military division, had no right to give a military order while he (Gen. Jackson) was in the field. The then Governor of Georgia (and I do not know but what it killed the poor man, for he died soon after) did contest the power of Gen. Jackson. He said all he could do for state rights, [a laugh,] but Andrew Jackson had given an order, and that order was carried into effect, while the order of the Governor was suppressed."

EXTRAORDINARY INSTINCT.

The following remarkable fact, connected with the death, or at least the discovery of the body of a man named Leoch, at Bredfield, is related in the Suffolk Chronicle. The deceased, who resided at Ufford, left the Castle public-house, at Bredfield, late at night, intoxicated, but in the company of two other persons, with whom he had been drinking, and who also lived at Ufford. After a short time, however, they passed one another the two latter having stopped, thinking the deceased was before and their not overtaking him did not create any alarm, but that all was right with him. After an anxious night and part of next day, he not coming home, his daughter resolved to go in search of him. Accordingly she set off for Petistree Tuns, but gaining no tidings of him there, she determined upon going to Bredfield Castle, about two miles distant. She had not left the Tuns long, when she met a dog, a terrier, which displayed great delight, as if it had met a person whom it had long known; though it seemed perfectly good natured, she was afraid of it, and beat it from her, and kept it at a distance by stoning it, but to no purpose; it still followed till her arrival at the Castle, at Bredfield, where, after learning the time and situation her parent had left there in the night before, full of wonder and fear as to what had become of him, she was about retracing her steps home the way she had come, but her companion was in waiting, and immediately ran on instead of following her as before, which attracted her attention, and induced her to follow it. When it ran down a drift leading to a footpath to Ufford by the side of which was a ditch, it suddenly stopped, making a dead point, and stood firm in that condition till the young woman came to the spot, when on looking into the ditch, she saw the body of her father extended at the bottom, partly covered with water. She immediately gave an alarm, and the body was removed to the public house to await the issue of the coroners inquest. The young woman went home, attended by the faithful companion, where it has ever since remained, showing the greatest attachment to the place and the family of the deceased. A most mysterious feature in this singular case is, that no no one knows the dog, to whom it belongs, or from whence it came, although it has been seen by many persons since, for the purpose of identifying it.

Retributive Justice of the Indian.—An event took place at Prairie Du Chien, last week, which strongly marks the savage character. Two Indians, of the Winnebago nation, quarrelled, upon which one stabbed the other to the heart; he made almost superhuman efforts to escape, but the moment his pursuers touched him he surrendered and walked back, and seated himself upon the dead body, without once attempting to escape. The relatives of the dead Indian placed him upon the body, when several whites interferred in behalf of the captive, and requested that he might be allowed to go, because he was not so much in fault as the other. They were answered, that if "white men" would pay fifteen dollars to the mother of the deceased, he might go, otherwise he must die.—This condition not being complied with, he was doomed. During this negotiation the savage sat upon the body of his foe, smoking his pipe, perfectly indifferent as to the issue, and when told he must die, he deliberately removed his pipe, giving the usual "Ugh!" His executioner then stepped behind him, and with a single blow of the hatchet, severed the right arm at the shoulder; upon this the Indian resumed his pipe and began to smoke as if nothing had happened; in a short time the executioner with a blow, severed the left arm. The Indian still retained his upright position, not a muscle of his face changing; a third across the small of the back brought him to the ground; even the countenance wore the same cold and stoic expression. He was, however, soon cut in pieces by the relatives of the dead man. This was an instance of Indian retribution and savage fortitude.—Dubuque Express.

Weakness of Slavery.—Few probably are aware how small is the basis on which the whole huge fabric of slavery in this country rests. Its influence on the national government is great, but its real strength is small. Dr. Channing, in speaking on this subject, says:—Morning Star.

"I have spoken of the great majority in our country who have no participation whatever in slavery. Indeed it is little suspected at home any more than abroad, how small is the number of slave-holders here. I learn from a judicious correspondent at the South, that the slave-holders in that region cannot be rated at more than 300,000. Some make them less. Supposing each of them to be the head of a family, and each family to consist of five members; then there will be 1,500,000, having a direct interest in slaves as property. This is about one eleventh of the population of the United States. The three hundred thousand actual slaveholders are about a fifty-sixth part of our whole population. These govern the South entirely, by acting in concert, and by the confinement of the best education to their ranks; and, still more, to a considerable extent, they have governed the whole country. Their cry rises above all other sounds in the land. Few as they are, their voices well-nigh drown the quiet reasonings and remonstrances of the North in the House of Representatives."

A Majestic Flower.—In a late number of the Petersburg Statesman, we find a description of a flowering tree which is found in the interior of Ceylon, and may be considered as a wonderful curiosity, excelling in beauty and grandeur all other plans in the vegetable kingdom. The body of the tree is sixty feet high and straight as a ship's mast, without limb or leaf; but supporting at the top an immense tuft of leaves, each of which is ten or twelve feet long. The stalks of these leaves clasp the body of the tree and incline outward, the long leaves bending over in a graceful curve. This vast crown of evergreen is of itself very grand; but when the tree is abut fifty years old, there rises from its centre a cone several feet in height, which gradually enlarges until at length it bursts with a loud explosion, and a vast brilliant golden-colored flower twelve feet in diameter appears over the elevated tuft of leaves as a gorgeous diadem on the head of this queen of the forest. The tree never blossoms but once, and does not long survive this grand display of magnificence.

Thinking and Acting.—Did you ever go into a rope-walk? If not, you may yet enjoy a fine surprise by visiting one. Some of them are more than half a mile long.—The strands are fastened at one end of the building, and twisted by machinery at the other end. A lady visited the rope-walk at Charleston, Mass., the other day. As she was gazing at the rapidly forming rope, her scarf became entangled in the strands, and she was drawn irresistibly towards it. She would have been strangled in a moment, had it not been for the great presence of mind displayed by Francis F. Joy, a workman who was near her.

There was not time to ring the bell as a signal to stop the machinery. He therefore rushed forward near the woman, and grasped the strand so firmly as to prevent any twist where the scarf was entangled.

The unconscious machinery moved on, till the strands were actually twisted off about an inch from his hands. It must have hurt him severely, but he nobly kept his hold, and the lady was saved. His noble act caused a blistering and swelling of his hand, which lasted several days.

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

FORBEARANCE, KINDNESS, ETC.

"All that is great and good in the universe is on the side of clemency and mercy. If we look into the history of mankind, we shall find that in every age, those who have been respected as worthy, have been distinguished for this virtue. Revenge dwells in little minds; a noble and magnanimous spirit is superior to it. Collected within itself, it stands unmoved by the impotent assaults of our enemies; and with generous pity, rather than with anger, looks down on their unworthy conduct. It has been truly said, that the greatest man on earth can no sooner commit an injury than a good man can make himself greater by forgiving it."

Anger and revenge are uneasy passions; 'hence,' says Seed, 'it appears that the command of loving our enemies, which has been thought a hard saying, and impossible to be fulfilled, is really no more, when resolved into its first principles, than bidding us to be at peace with ourselves, which we cannot be, so long as we continue at enmity with others.'

The heathens themselves saw the reasonableness of the spirit which we are now inculcating, and approved of it. It is said concerning Julius Cæsar, that upon any provocation he would repeat the Roman alphabet before he suffered himself to speak, that he might be more just and calm in his resentments; and also that he could forget nothing but wrongs, and remember nothing but benefits.

'It becomes a man,' says the Emperor Antonius, 'to love even those that offend him.' 'A man hurts himself,' says Epictetus, 'by injuring me: and what then? Shall I therefore hurt myself by injuring him?' 'In benefits,' says Seneca, 'it is a disgrace to be outdone; in injuries to get the better.' Another heathen, when he was angry with some one, said to him, 'I would beat thee, but I am angry.'

Philip, the King of Macedon, discovered great moderation, even when he was spoken to in shocking and injurious terms. At the close of an audience which he gave to some Athenian ambassadors, who were come to complain of some act of hostility, he asked whether he could do them any service. 'The greatest service thou couldst do us,' said Demochares, 'would to hang thyself.' Philip, though he perceived all the persons present were highly offended at these words, made the following answer, with the utmost calmness of temper: 'Go, tell your superiors that those who dare make use of such insolent language are more haughty and less peaceably inclined than those who can forgive them.'

It is recorded to the honor of Edward III., that one day, being laid down upon the bed, one of his domestics, who did not know that he was in the room, stole some money out of a chest he found open, which the king let him carry off without saying a word. Presently after the boy returned to make a second attempt; the king called out to him, without any violence of passion, 'Sirrah, you had best be satisfied with what you have got; for if my chamberlain come and catch you, he will not only take away what you have stolen, but also whip you severely.' The chamberlain coming in and missing the money, fell into a great rage; but the king calmly said to him, 'Be content; the chest should not have been left open. The temptation was too strong for the poor youth, he wanted money more than we do, and there is still enough left for us.'

There was one who did Sir Matthew Hale a great injury, who, coming afterwards to him for his advice in the settlement of his estate, he gave it very frankly to him, but would accept of no fee for it; and thereby showed both that he could forgive as a Christian, and that he had the soul of a gentleman in him, not to take money of one who had wronged him so heinously. When he was asked by one how he could use a man so kindly who had wronged him so much, his answer was, He thanked God, he had learned to forget injuries.

Mr. Burkitt observes in his journal, that some persons would never have had a particular share in his prayers, but for the injuries they had done him. This reminds me of an exemplary passage concerning Mr. Lawrence's once going, with some of his sons, by the house of a gentleman that had been injurious to him; he gave a charge to his sons to this purpose, 'That they should never think or speak amiss of that gentleman, on account of any thing he had done against him: This good man had learnt to practice that admirable precept of our Lord, 'Pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you.'

Of Mr. John Henderson it is observed, that the oldest friends never beheld him otherwise than calm and collected: it was a state of mind he retained under all circumstances. During his residence at Oxford, a student of a neighboring college, proud of his logical acquirements, was solicitous of a private disputation with the renowned Henderson: some mutual friends introduced him, and having chosen his subject, they conversed for some time with equal candor and moderation; but Henderson's antagonist, perceiving his confutation inevitable, (forgetting the character of a gentleman, and with a resentment engendered by his former arrogance,) threw a full glass of wine in his face. Henderson, without altering his features, or changing his position, gently wiped his face, and then coolly replied, 'This, sir, is a digression: now for the argument.'

A gentleman once went to Sir Eardley Wilmot (Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas,) under the impression of great wrath and indignation at a real injury he had rceived from a person high in the political world, and which he was meditating how to resent in the most effectual manner. After relating the particulars, he asked Sir Eardley if he did not think it would be manly to resent it. 'Yes,' said the knight, 'it will be manly to resent it, but it will be God-like to forgive it.' The gentleman declared that this had such an instantaneous effect upon him, that he came away quite a different man, and in a very different temper from that in which he went.

'Let nothing,' says one, 'be done too suddenly or angrily: let us be men of thoughts. It was the habit of more than one holy man, not to give a reply to any important query before he had made a pause, and put up a silent ejaculation; and a steady person used to stop another, inconsiderately hasty, with, 'Pray stay a little, and we shall have done the sooner.'

The late Rev. Mr. Clark, of Frome was a man of peace. He was asked one day by a friend, 'How he kept himself from being involved in quarrels?' He answered, 'By letting the angry person always have the quarrel to himself.' This saying seems to have had some influence on some of the inhabitants of that town; for when a quarrel has been likely to ensue, they have said, 'Come, let us remember old Mr. Clark, and leave the angry man to quarrel by himself.' If this maxim were followed, it would be a vast saving of expense, of comfort, and of honor, to thousands of the human race.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

'TIS ALL FOR THE BEST.

A pious sea captain was accustomed, whatever afflictive Providence might befall him, to express himself as perfectly satisfied, it would be in one way or another to his advantage. It happened, just previous to an important voyage he was contemplating, he had his leg broken by a fall, so that he was prevented from embarking. An intimate friend—a stranger to the resources and consolations of piety—knowing the usual method by which he had resolved his difficulties, asked him if he thought that was for the best? To whom the more than heroic, the Christian navigator promptly replied, he had no doubt of it. Even to the view of a worldling, whose vision is so narrow he can grasp nothing beyond the boundaries of time, the result proved the position to be correct. The vessel sailed at the appointed time. The second in command took the place of the captain.—Prosperous breezes sped the crew away from port; but, as in the affecting instance of the President steamer, no one ever returned to give an account of the disaster that must have occurred. In a moment they may have sunk like lead in the mighty deep, or stranded upon some inhospitable shore, they may have lived and died the slaves of savages, or have been instantly dispatched by their barbarous hands. It was all for the best.

Such invariably we are taught is the character of Divine Providence towards the pious. It often proves so in an aspect strictly temporal. The patriarch Jacob exclaimed, as his trials thickened upon him, "All these things are against me." Yet the unseen hand of God turneth them all to his profit. His darling Joseph, instead of having been devoured by some wild beast, was sold into Egypt by his envious brothers, where God, after supporting him in the dungeon, at length placed him at the right hand of Pharaoh, by which means, during a protracted famine, he not only saved Egypt, over which he was Lord, but his father also and all his household. We are also referred by Scripture to the more remarkable instance of Job. At first he seemed to be a mark for all the arrows that Satan could direct. Only his life was kept out of his hands. His effects, his herds, and flock, were taken. His ten children, by a whirlwind from the wilderness, were crushed together in the house where they were feasting. The wife of his bosom bade him curse his God, and die. His health, as well as his wealth, took wings, and fled away. And his friends that should have cheered his broken heart, upbraided him with taunting reflections, and hesitated not to prefer against him the odious charge of hypocrisy. But the thick cloud that seemed to threaten his very life, began to dissipate. The storm of adversity abated. Its lightnings ceased to scathe his soul. Health, and wealth, and children, and friends not only returned, but returned in a measure far exceeding that of his former prosperity. Should there, however, be no relief as to this world—should death alone prove the closing scene of trial, still it is all for the best.

Affliction, by the grace of God, is the furnace of the soul, to purge away its dross, and make it as the gold which has been thoroughly refined. Irksome as it is to flesh and blood, and for the time being exceedingly grievous, it nevertheless afterwards yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness. The mortification of the carnal affections proves the renewal and invigoration of the spiritual appetites. Often the result of the process is so happy as more than to reconcile the suffering subject to the severity of its mode. He counts it all joy in being thought worthy of chastisement, and sings of the judgment that deals the blow, because of the mercy by which it is tempered. And what is death but gain? Death, besides forever terminating the sorrows of the saint, introduces him to a larger share of celestial bliss than he had otherwise received. His light afflictions, which are but for a moment, in the beautiful and consoling language of inspiration, work out for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. What more then can the sons and daughters of affliction ask, if they only improve the dispensations of the Lord? "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called, according to his purpose." What would they have altered in the eternal, merciful arrangement of their heavenly Father? What one of the blessings he has designed them would they be refused? What part of the celestial glory that awaits them would they be denied?—Who would not suffer with Christ on earth, to reign with him in heaven? Go, then, child of sorrow, and take down thy neglected harp. Sweep its melodious strings with animated strains of thanksgiving and joyous acquiescence in the pleasure of the Lord. All losses and crosses are blessings in disguise. And in the darkness and stillness of midnight, let the hymn rise to heaven—

> "No more, believers mourn your lot,
> But, since you are the Lord's,
> Resign to them that know him not,
> Such joys as earth affords."

A CHRISTIAN'S NATIVE COUNTRY.—Christians profess to be natives of heaven, to be born from above. They sojourn for a season in the world, as in a foreign land, till their father and king summon them home. They speak the language of the Gospel, or of the kingdom of heaven, and understand it; and they know each other hereby. They agree to meet together to worship their King, and pay allegiance to Him, to learn more of his will, and seek his favor. The day of their solemn assemblies is the day of the resurrection of Christ, the Son of God, and their Lord.—When they do special honors to him, they eat bread and drink wine, to solemnize the memory of their deliverance from sin and hell, when he was sent into the world to die for them. Then, by calling away their hearts from this world, and conversing about heavenly things, they are continually preparing for their return home. They choose one or more teachers, pastors, or bishops, to instruct them in their duty, and to offer up their common addresses to God, in the name of Christ; to put them in mind of holiness. They choose deacons to relieve the poor, out of their public liberality, as well as to take care that their pastors or teachers be maintained. They receive in new members who are worthy, upon their profession; and they cast out those that are dishonorable. They walk onward in this way toward the heavenly state; and wait the summons from on high, to call them thither by death and the resurrection.—Dr. Watts.

From the Boston Miscellany

THE NECESSITY OF RELIGION.

We sometimes hear religion spoken of, and still more often hear it treated as if it were a useful thing indeed, but of no essential importance—useful to the poor as the teacher of contentment; useful to the sorrowing, the bereaved, the tried; useful as a prop of government, and the enforcer of order and peace, but not indispensable to the man himself. But this is a wretched delusion. The importance of religion lies in this, that it contains the laws of the development and perfection of man's spiritual nature—the laws of its health, and hope, and bliss, now and forever—laws which can no more be neglected, than can those of his physical being, without spiritual disease, deformity, and death. Religious truth forms the soil, the air, the sky, in the midst of which the soul should grow. He who repels it from him, repels that which is the great supporter of the soul's life. It is as if some stately tree on the banks of an inland stream (could we for a moment, adopting the symbolic language of Scripture, imagine it endowed with thought and the power of executing its volitions,) should repel and shut out from itself the influence of the elements in whose midst it grew and flourished. As it meditates under the summer sun, the gentle river rippling along by its roots, and feels its strength which bows not before any tempest, its heart is lifted up in pride; and a voice from out its leaves whispers, 'I can stand alone. The far-off sun is so distant from me that it can do me no good, it only withers up my leaves; the winds disturb and break my branches; the river washes the soil away from my roots. I want not the help of chilling dews and the hot noon. Let me stand alone!' Suppose that with the will, it has also the power, and repels from itself all these elements, and shuts them out, until it stands as if it were enclosed in some sphere impenetrable to them. The sun vanishes, the air no longer moves amidst its leaves, the dews cease to fall around it, and the roots reach out but find no longer the fresh waters of the river. From this little spot of self-dependent pride the elements are shut out—and while all around is green and flourishing, its leaves wither, its life perishes, and it remains bare and blasted, a monument of death.

So have men speculated about religion. Its motives are far-off, some reaching into the abysses of eternity—why should I need what is so distant? Its action, like a tempest, has sometimes disturbed the peace of the world; it subjects me to self-denial and unwelcome duties; and though it may be good for the ignorant and weak, I have no need of it. 'I can stand alone!' But if in his presumptuous folly the man does really reject, not the name but the laws of religion, and ceases to obey them, as surely as the moral not less than the material world is governed by laws, in the same degree as he rejects them, every virtue will dry up, the affections will be perverted and dwarfed, and the very capacity of a high excellence wither away.

Religion is not merely the supporter of law and public order, a thing of forms which may or may not indifferently be neglected; its object is not merely to teach contentment to the tried, and consoling hopes to the wretched; it is not merely a pleasant subject for speculation in health, and a ministering angel wreathing graceful folds like sunset clouds around the parting hour; but it is the foundation of excellence, and the very life of all progress towards perfection. And such have all, who have lovingly received it into their hearts, and obeyed it in love, found it—found it in the words of the apostle, 'the power of God unto salvation.'

From the Day Spring.

HEATHENISM AND CHRISTIANITY CONTRASTED.

Heathenism.—The second evening after we arrived, says Rev. J. Read missionary to South Africa, we heard late in the evening that an old man and his wife had been carried away by their friends to the top of a precipice, and there left to die from hunger and cold. Early next morning I went to Pala, to request permission to try and save them. Nothing in the world could surprise him so much: he said their friends had nothing to give them, and there was a law that such persons should not die in one of their houses, nor near the kraal; otherwise the whole neighborhood must break up and leave. He said there was no objection to our sending them food, but he could not allow them to be brought to the kraal. The next day their son came to expostulate against our conduct, saying, that he wished to leave home, and could not go until his father and mother were dead, and that we were preventing them from dying by giving them food. How strong a proof that "the dark parts of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty!"

Christianity.—However, we saved the lives of the old people for the time, by sending them food daily; so that they recovered and came back to their house; and the interpreter, with our Fingo brother, visited them daily, and made known Jesus unto them. The result eternity alone will tell.

Heathenism.—A sister of one of our domestics, says Rev. David Cargill missionary among the Feejees, a female about 17 or 18, became the victim of consumption. She was a servant of the queen of Rewa. The queen, although she has on most occasions been very kind to the missionaries and the members of their families, has not yet embraced Christianity. When informed of that persons sickness, she said:—"Throw her into the river to the sharks: she is of no use to us: she is useful only as food for the sharks!"

Christianity.—The poor girl betook herself to the mission premises. She heard that the missionaries and their wives were the friends of the aged, the sick, and the abandoned. She was there for some days without our knowledge of the fact; but frequently seeing an invalid about the premises, we made inquiries, and were told who she was, what the queen had said respecting her, and what was her design in taking up her abode in our premises. We received her. We endeavored to do for her every thing in our power; but we saw, that although by our efforts we might perhaps alleviate her pain and prolong her existence a little, the disease would triumph over every exertion. We informed her of our opinion. We urged on her the necessity of receiving the truths of Christianity. She did so: she listened to instruction. It was not much that she could learn, for after she came to our premises she had not many weeks to live. On the afternoon of her death, when summoned to stand about her dying mat, she said to her sister, "Sangole you are a bad girl: your actions are bad: they are bad to God: they are bad to Jesus the son of God, the Savior of sinners. If you do not abandon your bad actions, Jesus will not take you to heaven. Heaven is a good place; but you cannot go there, while you continue to perform such bad actions. Abandon such conduct: listen to the instruction of the missionaries and then you will be made happy forever?" She had not time or opportunity to manifest her repentance by her subsequent conduct; but we had no reason to doubt her conversion.

WHO IS THE CHRISTIAN WOMAN?

BY REV. J. N. MAFFITT.

She who, like Mary, received her first and sweetest lessons at the feet of Jesus;—whose lips have been inspired by the magic of his love and name, and whose heart beats in unison with the harps of heaven. She whose sins have been blotted out, and whose name is registered in the Lamb's book of Life.

Who is the Christian Woman? She who diffuses happiness all around by the sweetness of her disposition, the gentleness of her manners, and the light of her example—a moving wonder of benevolence; who carries a heaven within herself, and within whose balmy atmosphere every bosom shall sigh to come.

Who is the Christian Woman? She who delights the hearts of her friends, her parents, her husband, and her brother, by acts of sincere, affectionate kindness, complacency, and love.

Who is the Christian Woman? She who bends over the couch of infancy—the cradle-bed of our young, and, as yet, unfledged existence, whispering love and prayer into those tender ears which thrill with delight, as an Eolian trembles under the kissing zephyrs. She who kindly guides the steps of youth—who bends over the pillow of pain, disarming anguish of half its excruciating agony. She who grasps the couch of death, where science dare no longer contend with the king of terrors, and with skill retires from the unequal task. Then the Christian woman's hour hath come, and affection struggles with death, and cries to the dull ears of the tomb, "Give me back my love!" And while she kisses away the clammy dews of dissolution, she wrestles with the enemy while hope and life remain; nor will she leave the dead. No, no; the poor, pale remains of the loved one are dear to her still. She strews roses around the bier, and often, in far distant years, in evening's solemn hour, or beneath the silver moonlight, she revisits the grave by others forgotten and unknown. She comes like a soft spirit, noiseless, and tearful, and holy, to call up all the luxury of her still unwasted love. Here she converses with the past, until the immortal spirit of the slumberer at her feet rises before her, and hovers over the spot where the mortal part is resting—it imprints celestial kisses upon her spirit, and bright visions of quietness, and the dreamy joys of death, and eternal rest, pass through her sweet cored, her sanctified soul.

Charmers of our lives! Soothers of our deaths! The first to rock our puny frames—the last to desert our clay-cold dust—the rich, rejoicing, fresh, lovely, and exuberant vines, to twine in graceful fitness around the rugged oaks of manhood, clinging the closer the louder the storm blows, and the thunder roars, and the tempest howls—to you, and to you only, do I bring this humble tribute of my respect for your character.

It is the Christian woman I laud—she who owes her life, her soul, her all to the Gospel—whose buds of promise would never have expanded but for its genial sunshine—whose leaves are now for the healing of the nations, and whose clustering fruit is nectar to the soul of man.

Boston, Mass., January, 1842.

THE PARTING HOUR.—The hour is coming, and it is a fearful and solemn hour, even to the wisest and the best, the hour is coming, when we must bid adieu to the scenes which please us, to the families we love, to the friends we esteem. Whether we think, or whether we think not, that body which is now warm and active with life, shall be cold and motionless in death—the countenance must be pale, the eye must be closed, the voice must be silenced, the senses must be destroyed, the whole appearance must be changed by the remorseless hand of our last enemy. We may banish the remembrance of the weakness of our human nature, we may tremble at the prospect of dissolution; but our reluctance to reflect upon it, and our attempts to drive it from our recollection, are in vain We know that we are sentenced to die, and though we sometimes succeed in casting off for a season the conviction of this unwelcome truth, we never can entirely remove it. The reflection haunts us still, it attends us in solitude, it follows us into society, it lies down with us at night, it awakens with us at morning. The irrevocable doom has passed upon us, and too well do we know it. "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."—Townsend.

"GO RIGHT OFF."

I was present, recently, in one of the Sabbath schools of this city, when the exercises were concluded by an excellent address from the superintendent. He commenced his remarks by asking the children to mention the second petition in the Lord's Prayer. A sweet voice from a class of little girls, was heard to reply—"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

"Well, 'as it is in heaven,' but how is the will of God done in heaven?" said the superintendent. "How do the angels do the will of God? Do they act as if they wanted to do something else, when God tells them to do any thing? Do they stop, and hesitate, and act as if they didn't like to do it? How do they do?"

"Go right off," was the prompt answer of a little boy eight or nine years of age. "Yes, they 'go right off,' and that is the way the will of God must be done on earth. It must be done immediately. As soon as we know the will of God we must do it."

The simple but emphatic reply of this little scholar arrested my attention, and suggested an important principle of action—"Go right off"—that is, obey promptly It will not be denied that promptness of obedience is one of the first lessons which a child should learn, and yet, such is the neglect of parents and guardians of youth, and their insensibility with respect to its importance, that this is, in fact, one of the last lessons which is really and thoroughly taught. Promptness is essential to the spirit of true obedience, for so long as a child delays to obey a parent who has given a command, so long that child is virtually disobedient. The delay is caused solely by a rebellious spirit, and every moment's indulgence of the child in his delay, is an indulgence to his self-will, and allows the exercise of a spirit of rebellion against the proper authority. And this delay tends, by necessity, to the formation of a stubborn and ungovernable temper of mind. Let the parent, then, who would hope for perfect obedience, see to it that it is prompt. Let the parent require the child, as soon as the word is given, to "go right off." A moment's delay granted, or a moment's parley, may dissolve the magic charm of sovereignty over the mind of the child.—With a reason or without a reason, the child should "go right off."

But promptness of obedience to parents is important not merely as it is related to family government. It has respect to the salvation of the child. Parents, are you aware that you are governing your children for God? Do you know that when you require your child to acquiesce immediately in your known will, you are taking one of the surest means to secure his instant acquiescence in the divine will?—Have you thought when permitting a child to defer an unconditional surrender to you, as his rightful governor, that you were indirectly keeping that child from an acknowledgment of Jehovah as his rightful Sovereign and Lord? Other things being equal, the child that is prompt in his obedience to an earthly parent, will be the most ready to do the will of his Father who is in heaven. The history of revivals abundantly shows that, apart from direct religious influence, the best governed families contain the largest number of those who are willing in the day of God's power.

Parents and teachers, will you not think of this? Will you not pray for the aid of divine grace to assist you in securing the prompt, entire and cheerful obedience of those committed to your charge to train for heaven. Insist upon instant, as well as constant obedience, and endeavor, by all the means in your power, to form, in the mind of your child or pupil, a habit of prompt obedience to every just requirement, whether it be of a parent, a teacher, a civil ruler, or of God. In other words, when you tell the child to do any thing, always require that he should "go right off," and aim, also, most assiduously to produce in him a spirit of cheerful compliance, so that, upon the simple announcement of any duty, he shall be willing to "go right off" and do it. UNKINDNESS TO A SISTER.

"Little children, love one another."—John.

One morning in my early life I remember to have been playing with my younger sister, not then three years old. It was one of those bright mornings in the spring that bring joy and life to the heart, diffuse gladness and animation through all the tribes of living creatures. Our feelings were in perfect harmony with the universal gladness of nature. Even now I seem to hear the merry laugh of my sister as she followed me through the winding alleys of the garden, her cheek suffused with the glow of health and animation, and her waving hair floating with the wind.

She was my only sister, the sole companion of my childish sports. We were constantly together; and my young heart went out to hers with all the affection, all the fondness of which childhood is capable. Nothing afforded me enjoyment in which she did not participate; no amusement was sought in which we could not share together.

That morning we had prolonged our play till near the hour of breakfast, with undiminished ardor, when at some slight provocation, my impetuous nature broke forth and I struck my little sister a blow with my hand. She turned to me with an appealing look, and the large tears came in her eyes; her heart was too full to allow her to speak, and shame made me silent. At that moment the breakfast bell summoned us away, and we returned without exchanging a word. The excitement of play was over, and as she sat beside my mother at breakfast, I perceived by occasional glances at her, that she was pale and sad. A tear seemed ready to start in her eye, which her little self-possession could scarcely suppress. It was only when my mother inquired if she was ill that she drank her coffee and endeavored to eat. I was ashamed and grieved, and inwardly resolved to embrace the first opportunity, when we were alone, to throw my arms around her neck, and entreat her forgiveness.

When breakfast was ended, my mother retired with her into her room, directing me in the meantime to sit down to my lessons. I seated myself at the window, and ran over my lesson, but did not learn it; my thoughts were perpetually recurring to the scene in the garden, and at the table. It was long before my mother returned; and when she did, it was with an agitated look, and hurried step, to tell me that poor Ellen was very ill. I asked eagerly if I might go to her, but was not permitted lest I should disturb her. A physician was soon called, and every means made use of for her recovery, but to no purpose. The disease, which was in her head, constantly increased in violence, and she became delirious. It was not till evening that I was permitted to see her: she was a little recovered from the severity of her pain, and lay with her eyes closed, and her little hand resting on the pillow beneath her head. How I longed to tell her the sorrow I felt for my unkindness to her in the morning, and how much I had suffered for it during the day! But I was forbidden to speak to her, and was soon taken out of the room. During that night, and the day following, she grew worse. I saw her several times, but she was insensible of my presence. Once, indeed, she showed some signs of consciousness and asked for me; but immediately relapsed into her former state.

On the morning of the third day I arose at an early hour and repaired to the sick room. My mother was sitting by the bed. As I entered, she drew me to her, and for some time was silent, while the tears flowed fast down her cheeks. I first learned that my sweet sister was dead, as my mother drew aside the curtain which concealed her from me. I felt as though my heart would break. The remembrance of her affection for me, and my last unkind deed, revived in my mind, and burying my face in the folds of the curtain, I wept long and bitterly.

I saw her laid in the coffin, and lowered into the grave. I almost wished to lie down with her, if so I might once more see her smile, and hear my forgiveness pronounced in her sweet voice.

Years have passed away, and I am now a man, but never does the recollection of this incident of my early life fail to awaken bitter feelings of remorse; and never do I see any of my young friends exchanging looks or words of anger, without thinking of my last pastime with my own loved sister.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, May 25, 1842.

A Word to our Friends and Patrons.

The present No. closes the 1st quarter of this Vol. At the commencement of the volume we altered the terms of the Register to $2 in advance, or in 3 months. The three months have now expired, and we have received about one-quarter of what is due. We have, however, as yet been able to meet our debts, while several of our contemporaries, with as fair a list as ours, have been obliged to suspend the publication of their papers. There is a very general complaint by publishers that they do not receive pay sufficient to meet their expenses; and unless money matters change, many more papers must be suspended. We do not suppose that our subscribers are willing to have the Register discontinued; nor do we fear that it will be the case. The characteristic liberality of the denomination will not be sacrificed so cheap. We are fully aware of the hardness of the times, and the difficulty that many of our subscribers have in getting money. We cannot, therefore, blame them for not having complied with our terms, and we are quite willing to extend the time of payment, being assured that the disposition is better than the ability to meet the demand, and that the ability only is wanting. We shall not charge any thing for further credit. Two DOLLARS received at any time will pay for the 3d vol. With prompt payment from our present list of subscribers, we shall be able to continue the publication of the Register without embarrassment.

Baptism.

A writer in the South Western Christian Advocate says: that Methodists baptize three classes, viz., "converted believers, unconverted believers, and infants." They also practice three modes, immersion, pouring and sprinkling. As it regards the first class, and the first mode, we have no controversy with them. This is scriptural.—But where to find the authority to baptize "unconverted believers and infants," or to substitute "pouring and sprinkling" for Baptism, we know not. From the commission given by Jesus Christ to his disciples, and from the teaching of the Apostles, we learn that faith was a pre-requisite to Baptism. If a man have not faith in Jesus Christ, and the plan of salvation through him, he is yet in his sins and baptism can profit him nothing. The moment he exercises faith in Jesus Christ he submits to him, and is a converted man, and as a believer is a fit subject for Baptism. Hence the term "unconverted believer" is improper, for no such person can be found. 'Tis true there may be a sort of nominal belief. A man may yield a passing assent to the fact that Jesus Christ is the son of God, that he lived some eighteen hundred years ago, and that he died to save sinners, but he cannot believe in the doctrine of the gospel and teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ, and remain unconverted. This is contrary to men's nature and habits. If he believes the promises and threatenings given in the word of God, he will yield at once, because his temporal and eternal interests are hazarded by delaying to submit to God.

By what authority they baptize infants, we are not able to divine, unless it be the authority of tradition. We are unable to find even an example for it in the word of God, much less instruction to that effect.—Beside, faith is a pre-requisite, and this cannot be exercised by an unconscious infant.—Nor can another exercise faith for him.—We must therefore conclude that the baptism of infants is a work of supererogation, and is not acceptable in the sight of God.

We object to pouring and sprinkling as being contrary to the letter and spirit of that rite. The word Baptizo is the only word used in the Greek Testament where Gospel Baptism is mentioned. It is even conceded by Pedo-baptists, of any philological knowledge, that the primitive meaning of Baptizo is to immerse, to dip. and all lexicographers, ancient and modern, concur in the same opinion.

The metaphorical use of the word likewise signifies to overwhelm, as in the language of John, "he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," which was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost. Also the language of Jesus, "are ye able to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" (i. e.) to bear the overwhelming load that rested upon him. Also, Paul's allusion to the passage of the Red Sea, "all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the Sea."

The account that is given of the baptism of believers, in the New Testament, proves conclusively that baptism was by immersion. Had we therefore no other proof than the practice of the Apostles, we should conclude that immersion only was gospel Baptism. But this conclusion is strengthened by the use of the word rendered baptize.

Episcopacy, Pedo-baptism, and First day Sabbath.

The Banner of the Cross has taken up the Baptist Record, on remarks made relative to "Lord's Day," and insists that Episcopacy and Pedo-baptism can be established by the same arguments that establish the first day Sabbath. We offered remarks to the effect that the first day Sabbath, and Pedo-baptism were established by the same kind of arguments. We shall be glad to see him of the Record show to the contrary if he is able. We firmly believe that the Sabbath of the commandment is the true Christian Sabbath, and the immersion of believers the only true baptism, and suppose it may easily be shown.

Dueling.

Mr. Wise, Member of Congress from Va., has been laboring some time to get a challenge from Mr. Stanley, of N. C., and has at length succeeded. Mr. Stanley left the district with his friends to avoid the duel law, expecting to meet Mr. Wise the next day. But Mr. Wise was apprehended by the civil authorities, and detained from meeting Mr. S. He was held in bonds of $3,000 to keep the peace. Alas! for his chivalry. The law to prevent murder has prevented him from complying with the "law of [dis]honor," to set himself up as a fool to be shot at, with the privilege of shooting at another fool at the same time. If we were to speak for the honor of our country, we would say, by all means, let such chivalrous fellows fight and kill each other, and rid the country and Congress of bipeds so unworthy a place in a civilized country. Soberly, we ask Christians and philanthropists is it not time to put forth an influence that shall drive such desperadoes from Legislative Halls, and all places of honor. We never can hope for equitable and righteous laws when we choose Legislators who fear not God, nor regard the rights of men. Our Legislative bodies must be purified of such men, and it remains with the lovers of good order to put forth an influence that shall rectify public feeling in this matter.

If the Christian were to make the things of the kingdom the theme of his meditations, the prime subject of his conversation, and the great object of his pursuit, he would then find streams of pleasure ever flowing into his heart, and the thousand vexations cares that perplex him, would be known no more; the rough ways of life would become smooth; the vanities of time would cease to charm; the temptations of the adversary would become powerless, and undisturbed, he might walk the peaceful narrow road to Heaven. Doing this, he would so clearly exhibit the excellence of the Gospel as to silence the caviler, and convince the infidel of the truth of divine revelation. Blasphemers would cease their blasphemy, and all men would be led to admire and embrace a system so pure, so divine, and so well calculated to quiet the angry storms of life, and smooth the pathway to the grave while it ravished the soul with the glorious and certain prospect of stripping death of its terrors—the grave of its power, and giving endless life and bliss at the right hand of God in heaven.

Sabbath Schools.

Now is the time to recommence the schools that have been discontinued through the winter, and to organize new ones where none have existed. Who will go into the work? A very great portion of the children in the land are growing up in great ignorance of God, and his law, and are thus preparing themselves to throng the way to death. Here is a field in which all Christians may labor and be eminently useful. Let those who think themselves feeble go out and invite to the Sabbath School those who have none to instruct them. Your faithful efforts in this matter may hereafter afford you much joy, when you see those praising God in his kingdom whom your instrumentality has brought under the influence of the gospel. Who has a mind to work? What you do, do quickly, and continue doing till all shall understand the will of God and do the same.

New York Anniversaries.

The great length of the account of the anniversaries must prevent their insertion in the Register. We may, hereafter, give abstracts of the reports and proceedings. Suffice it to say, for the present, that the anniversaries were well attended, and, as usual, full of interest. By the way, may not our annual assemblies be made more deeply interesting and profitable? Let those who go up to them labor for this purpose, and a new impetus will be given to our operations.

Rhode-Island Affairs.

Affairs in R. I. seem to assume a serious aspect. What the sequel will be, the future must determine. Some of our readers may perhaps expect us to give an account of the matter as it progresses. Others know more of it than we can possible give. The news this week seems important.

Gov. Dorr has issued his proclamation, calling on the militia and volunteers to organize and hold themselves in readiness to resist any interference on the part of the U. S., for the "Charter" party. He rests on the "People's Constitution," determined to maintain the right of suffrage to all the people. He regrets that the Constitutional question can not be settled by her own citizens. But as the minority have asked that the sword of the National Executive may thrown into the scale against the people it is imperative upon them to make the same appeal to their brethren of the States, an appeal which they are well assured will not be made in vain.

Fire and Loss of Life.—By a letter from Br. J. P. Livermore, of Independence, Allegany co., we learn that the house of Luther Green, of that town, with all its contents, were burned on the morning of the 30th ult., and that his wife was so badly burned that she survived but a few hours.

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY:—I take this method of informing Br. Paul Stillman, General Agent of the Tract Society, and the friends of Tract distribution generally, that after presenting the subject to the church in Clarence, the church and Society, by a unanimous vote, authorized me to say that they would pay their equal share with the other churches in the denomination of the twelve hundred dollars proposed by the Agent, as published in his Circular a few weeks since, to accomplish the Society's present object.

Respectfully, yours,
N. V. HULL.

Congressional News.

From the New-York Evangelist.

WASHINGTON, MAY 16, 1842.

The affair between Messrs. Stanley and Wise has continued to occupy much of the time and attention of the public, both in and out of Congress, the past week. I think I mentioned in my last, that Mr. Stanley had left the city, as it was reported, to prepare himself for the duel. This roused a general determination to prevent the fight, if possible. Accordingly, warrants were issued for the arrest of both of the men, with a view to bind them over to keep the peace. Stanley being absent, Wise only was arrested. He denied the jurisdiction of the Court, but, after full argument, was required this morning to give bonds, in the sum of $3,000, to keep the peace in this District, and not to leave it for the purpose of fighting Mr. Stanley.—This is a mere farce—a May game. If the infamy of a public prison would not restrain him from violating the law against dueling, so trivial a sum would have little influence over the conduct of a man of wealth. There is a general impression that the parties will contrive to evade the law. The current of public sentiment sets much more strongly against the practice than it did five years ago. The passage of the law, after the Cilley duel, was not without a happy effect; and other causes have since co-operated to lead to the same result.

The McLeod Bill,

or the bill to remove the jurisdiction in certain cases from State to National Courts, has been considered for several days in the Senate. Messrs. Buchanan, Berrien, Choate, and Huntington, have spoken at length on the bill. It is objected that in time of peace, the National Government has no right to interfere with the punishment of crimes committed on the soil, or under the jurisdiction of any State Government. And if a foreign power assumes the responsibility of such an act, committed by one of its citizens, it is a virtual declaration of war, and must be treated as such.—Acts of war are not allowable in time of peace. On the other hand, it is urged, that when such cases do occur, the entire disposal of them necessarily belongs, under the Constitution, to the United States; and the law should provide accordingly. The question is one of great delicacy—new, in some respects, as a matter of law; and no more likely to be settled than the power to create banks, or any other issue between the friends and opponents of "strict construction."

Mr. Choate's speech in favor of the bill, is spoken of as the finest display of legal science and eloquence combined, that has been witnessed in that Hall for many years. I am sorry to hear renewed intimations that Mr. Choate will retire from the Senate at the close of this session.

News of the Day.

AFFAIRS IN RHODE-ISLAND.

From the New-York Tribune.

PROVIDENCE, May 16, 1842.

Rhode-Island, Dorr in Providence, Avowed Defiance to the Government, &c.—A greater excitement exists than has prevailed at any previous time. The crisis has arrived, and the end cannot be far distant. Mr. Dorr was received at the depot, and escorted thro' the streets by about 1,100 men, of whom 275 were armed and 75 mounted. He made a violent speech, drew his sword, brandished it in the air, and swore to die rather than yield. He is thoroughly desperate and will pause at nothing. He ordered the military to be in readiness at an hour's notice, and summoned the officers to an immediate council at his quarters. It is rumored that an attack will be made upon the arsenal, but I do not believe it. They have too much discretion to make any such movement.

Some of their men have approached the Government with some proposition for a compromise; but Dorr at once repudiated the whole, and declared that he would have nothing to do with it. The Government of course would not make any compromise with men armed against its authority, even if the declaration of Dorr, who is supreme dictator of the party, had not averted it. The Proclamation of Dorr you will see in the papers. CANONICUS.

P. S.—We have private advices from Providence an hour later than the foregoing. Mr. Dorr has established his head-quarters at the house of Burrington Anthony, (his Sheriff,) on the hill, which is defended by two field-pieces and an armed force, and he defies the Government to arrest or meddle with him.

From Rhode-Island—Latest.—A gentleman who came from Providence last evening in the steamer Narragansett, informs us that about 4 o'clock, P. M., the insurgents succeeded in getting forcible possession of two cannon and some muskets, the property of the State, but used by the artillery. It was reported that they were contemplating an attack upon the Arsenal.—N. Y. Jour. of Com.

OFFICE OF THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,
Tuesday, 3 P. M., May 17.

Mr. Dorr remains at the house of Burrington Anthony. The house is guarded by soldiers, and a cannon is placed by the side of it. At about 1 o'clock the signal of alarm was given, and according to orders, some two or three hundred men assembled. A portion of them were armed. The alarm was given in consequence of a report that the sheriff was about to arrest Dorr.—The crowd was very much excited. Burrington Anthony addressed them, and declared that Dorr should never be taken from that house alive. A voice in the crowd demanded to be led on the attack of the arsenal, and several responded to it; but the orator cautioned them against committing any "overt act." What an idea of government is this—that a government, which they say is legally established, cannot commit an overt act! Mr. Dorr ordered the military to meet them in the afternoon "prepared for action."

Foreign Aid.—The atrocious project charged upon Mr. Dorr, of calling upon armed ruffians from New-York to come here and sustain him upon the bloody throne which he hopes to erect in this State, is not only admitted in his speech yesterday, but boldly avowed, with the correction that the number called for was five thousand, not five hundred! Here is a man claiming to be supported by a majority at home, yet calling upon foreign aid to maintain his power. The character of such aid as can be found in New-York is understood by every one. No honorable men, no friends of law, no true citizens of any State, would engage in such a desperate enterprise; but the scum of all the earth, the vagabonds of the Five Points, the Spartan Band, the desperate villains of every country who congregate in certain portions of New-York, are the men, who induced by the hope of plunder, are expected to come here, and amid incendiarism, murder, and rapine, establish the reign of Thomas W. Dorr.—Can any language be too strong in denouncing the man whose unprincipled demagoguism has led him to such a measure?—How long will honest men be deluded into sactioning his course, participating in his crimes, and rendering themselves liable to his punishment?

As to the desperadoes of New-York, we do not suppose that any thing that we say will reach them; if it does, they may rest assured that if they come upon any such errand, they will never return.—Providence Journal.

The proclamation of Mr. Door, his open declaration of war against the United States, as well as this State, his insane defiance of all authority, and his preparations to bring an armed banditti into the city to sustain him in his usurpation, must open the eyes of all friends of order who were not already awake, to his most detestable designs. It remains to be seen how many will sacrifice their property, their safety, their honor, their lives, for the sake of his personal aggrandizement.

The duty of the good citizens of the State is plain. Every man should arm himself in readiness to obey the orders of the Governor. Business has already been nearly suspended; it might as well be quite so. And it would be a judicious plan for people to close their places of business, and entirely foregoing their customary avocations, devote themselves wholly to the defense of the State. In this way will peace be soonest restored to our istracted State; and such a manifestation of the determination of the citizens to maintain the laws would, more than any thing else, hasten the return of tranquility. The time has arrived when the maintenance of the laws is the highest duty and the highest interest of every man.—ib.

From the N. Y. Eve Post.

Cadet Armory, Providence,
May 17, 6 1-2 o'clock, P. M.

"We are in open rebellion here: an outbreak is expected every moment. I am drafted in the Cadet Company. I shall leave here for N. to-morrow, if I can. The suffrage military have just taken possession of the State's cannon. They are now going to take the arsenal. The crisis has come.

"We are all in arms. No time to write.
Yours, &c.

"I am at the cars; I am off in a moment. Just before writing this, I was in the council of Governor King; there is a list of one thousand men who have pledged themselves to come out at a moment's notice; they are now issuing orders. The military are coming in from all parts of the State. The Dorr troops are collecting, and in less than forty-eight hours the question will be settled."

LATEST FROM RHODE ISLAND.

From Boston by Rail Road.

We are indebted to Mr. Townsend of the Western Rail Road, and to Adam's Express, for the Boston Mercantile Journal of last evening, by the one o'clock run, from which we copy the following information from Rhode Island:—Eve. Jour.

Daily Express Office,
Wednesday, May 18, 6 A. M.

The War Commenced.—There was great activity amongst the Charter party last evening, their military were on duty at an early hour—their alarm posts were supplied with quantities of ball catridges—a steamboat was chartered to bring recruits from Bristol and Newport—and a placard of Gov. King invited citizens to supply themselves with arms from the Arsenal; every thing indicates a speedy conflict.

Gov. Dorr's quarters on Federal Hill were guarded by six cannon and by companies of troops, sufficient to resist any attack; strengthened by reinforcements a little before midnight, from Woonsocket.—A movement soon after in this party aroused the enemy, and about two in the morning the bells rung an alarm which brought on their soldiers, and called up the citizens.

There was skirmishing throughout the night, but no blood shed—the hostile parties still occupy the field in battle array, and a sanguinary conflict is momentarily expected.

Now is the time for those who have encouraged the patriots of Rhode Island with good wishes, to afford that more substantial succor which will enable them to put down forever a relentless and sanguinary foe to the people's rights."

The course of Gov. Dorr, since his return from Washington, appears to be in every respect unjustifiable, and calculated to lead to bloodshed. We hope, however, that such a calamity may yet be averted. His violent conduct, and evident contempt for all constituted authority, must surely disgust all men, of every party, who cherish any respect for our free institutions, or love of order.

Since writing the above, we have received the Providence Journal, from which paper we extract the following, by which it will be seen that the crisis is indeed approaching:—

"State of Affairs.—The movements of the last twelve hours have been of the highest interest and importance. If the crisis has not already passed before this reaches our readers, it will soon be here. At five o'clock, yesterday afternoon, a detachment of between fifty and sixty men marched from Mr. Dorr's quarters, to the town-house lot, with an order from him to take the field-pieces of the Artillery company. The commander, we are informed, declined to surrender them; but no resistance was made, nor any attempt to spike them, which might easily have been done.

It was rumored that an attempt would be made to seize the muskets in the Cadet armory. The Cadets mustered and prepared to defend their arms, but no attack was made. The two pieces of the Artillery Company were then carried, under guard, to Mr. Dorr's quarters, and with five or six others, were deposited around the house. The sight of this created an intense degree of excitement. In taking away the pieces, the balls and shot were left in the armory, and were afterwards sent for, but they were removed to a place of safety by the proper authorities.

At about seven o'clock, an order was issued by Governor King, requesting the citizens to go to the arsenal and receive arms. Messengers were despatched to various quarters, and the steamboat Rhode Island proceeded, at once, down the Bay. A man who was carrying two muskets, was stopped in the street, last evening, by three men, who presented their guns, and threatened his life if he did not surrender them. We hope they can be identified.

We are unable to state the number of men under arms at the Insurgent Head-quarters. Expresses have been sent by them to their friends in the country. A company from Pawtucket arrived early in the evening, and others had been sent for. It was currently reported among them that some demonstration would be made at two o'clock this morning. The Arsenal was first intended as the point of attack; but it was afterwards said that the armories in the centre of the city would be selected.

POSTSCRIPT.

Wednesday Morning 5 o'clock.—This morning a little before two o'clock, the insurgents marched in full force to the arsenal, with Dorr at their head, and demanded possession. Col. Blodget asked "in whose name?" The reply, was, "in the name of Col. Wheeler." Col. Blodget answered that he knew no such man.

The insurgents said, that unless the arsenal was surrendered at once, they should take it, and their force enabled them easily to do so. Col. Blodget answered that he should defend it, and the parley closed.—It is said that Dorr ordered his men to fire, and they refused. They departed without making any assault.

It is said that an unsuccessful attempt was made to work the pieces, but failed from want of skill in gunnery.

The steamboat despatched to Newport has not arrived.

It is difficult to ascertain the plans of the insurgents; but an impression prevails that an attack will be made on the arsenal or some more vulnerable point to-day.

ORDERS No. 5.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Providence, May 17, 1842.

Sir—You are hereby ordered to report yourself, with the men under your command, armed and equipped for service, forthwith to this Department, for further orders.

By order of his Excellency SAMUEL KING, Governor and Commander-in-chief.
ELISHA DYER, Jr.
Adjutant-General of Rhode Island.

[The above have been issued to the efficient chartered companies out of the city; those in the city are under arms by order of his Excellency the Governor.]

From the Cleaveland Daily Herald.

LAKE MICHIGAN.

The amount of business done on Lake Michigan this season will be very great. During April some thirty or forty vessels were loaded at different ports on the Lake with the products of the surrounding country, to say nothing of the quantities taken by the steamboats, which make some 15 trips during the month. What a contrast from 1836! Then vessels came down from Lake Michigan with sand for ballast—this season vessels have gone up from Buffalo with ballast only, after down freight!

The carrying trade from the Upper Lakes is destined in a few years to be a business of immense magnitude. The fertile regions of Northern Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Western Michigan, are only beginning to indicate what the future will be. Six years ago the forest and the prairie were scarcely marked by the footsteps of civilization. Now, New Englanders, Yorkers and Buckeyes, just the sort of enterprising population to transform the wilderness to fruitful fields, begin to dot with pleasant homes every nook and corner of the great and luxuriant Garden of the North-West. A strong tide of emigration still sets in upon the El Dorado, and every succeeding year will multiply the people and develop the resources of a section of our Union containing in embryo all the elements that constitute the wealth, glory and greatness of an empire.

The harbors and business of Lake Michigan have strong claims upon the consideration of Congress, and should not be overlooked by members whose constituencies border on the great inland chain of ship communication. The annual loss of shipping on Lake Michigan for the want of suitable harbors, is a serious drawback upon the commerce and prosperity of the North West, and appropriations to improve the harbors should be made as soon as practicable. The mineral trade alone will soon be of sufficient importance, if properly fostered, to warrant the appropriations necessary to construct harbors on the Western side of the Lake, for the Milwaukie Advocate states that a single firm there, the Messrs. Wards, will ship three millions of pounds of lead, copper and shot this summer down the lakes.

We learn by the N. Y. Eve. Post that Major Whistler, who was associated with Major McNiell in the construction of the Boston and Providence Rail road, and who, next to Major McNiell, is the ablest topographical engineer in this country, has been invited by the Emperor of Russia to superintend the construction of a rail road from St. Petersburgh to Moscow. This is not only a high compliment to Major Whistler, but also to our country, that we should furnish an engineer to construct rail roads in the Russian Empire. Whether he will accept of this flattering invitation or not, is as yet uncertain.

Six hundred and three members have been added to the several Baptist churches, eight in number, in Boston, during the months of March and April.

The Common Council of New York are confident in asserting "that the Croton Water will reach the city in July next."

Several failures have occurred recently, at N. Orleans, and some of the French houses are going "by the board."

Four steamboats, freighted with cotton, mostly of Texian growth, and deer skins, recently arrived at Alexandria, La., having passed the Red River raft with ease as soon as the water had risen sufficiently for navigation.

A number of barrels of corn oil have been sent from Ohio to Philadelphia. It is said to be an excellent commodity, burning as brilliantly as the purest sperm, without emitting any of the offensive odor of ordinary oil.

The Somerset county, N. J., jail is empty! The Whig says the keeper "proposes to put it in good order, while there is no one in the way, so that in case there should be a deficiency of accommodations elsewhere, he may afford a secure and comfortable shelter to the houseless and forlorn."

The Rev. James C. Groce, a clergyman 69 years old; was lately murdered at Pine Bluffs, Ark., by W. W. Daniel.

The Erie.—It has been understood that the steamer Star has been engaged for the purpose of recovering, if possible, the Engine of the lost Erie. The location where it sunk has been tolerably well marked out, and the prospect is that the undertaking will prove successful.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

The Supreme Court of this State decided that the sovereignty and consequent right of adopting a Constitution is confined to the Freeholders and their oldest sons.—Providence Express.

Inconvenience of Competition.—An Exchange paper says, "trout are so plenty in Granville, (Mass.,) that while one man is fishing for them, another is obliged to stand by the hook with a club, to prevent more than one from biting at a time."

Another Search for the Government of Central America.—Gen. Wm. S. Murphy, of Ohio, who was sent out to Central America last summer as a special agent by our Government, returned to New Orleans on the 5th.

Profit of Criminals.—The present number of convicts in the Connecticut State Prison is 211. Profits of the past year, $13,000, over and above the expenses of the prison.

Licenses in Maine.—The Board of Aldermen of the city of Portland, have unanimously voted not to grant any spirit licenses the ensuing year. Taverns are licensed with the restriction that they shall not sell intoxicating drinks.

New Orleans has 323 grog shops of different grades, paying for licenses $198,000; their cost to the city is estimated by the Bee at $2,200,000.

The Cincinnati Chronicle says, that Galena will soon be as large as St. Louis now is, and St. Louis soon be beyond Boston. The West is still retreating before us, and the cities of the West looming up from its woods and prairies.

On Sunday night, 25th ult., the shock of an earthquake was sensibly felt at Macon, Geo., and at Milledgeville still more plainly and powerfully. It was also noticed in other sections.

There is to be a General Council of the most important of the civilized tribes of Indians held at the Creek Council Ground some time this month. The Council has been called by General Rolly McIntosh, Principal Chief of the Creek Nation.—Gen. McIntosh has written invitations to Gen. Taylor, Capt. Armstrong, and Gov. Butler, and other Indian Agents, and also to some distinguished gentlemen of Arkansas, soliciting their attendance, as well as that of some of the best men of the several tribes within their respective agencies. The objects of the convention are pacific, and calculated for the mutual benefit of all concerned.

Paixhan Guns.—The Washington correspondent of the Boston Atlas, gives the following statement upon the Paixhan gun:

The Paixhan gun differs from a common 44, in having a very wide chamber. The bore at the muzzle is also larger than the bore of a 44 pounder, but this depends of course upon the size of the ball. The hollow shot range from 65 to 120 pounds, to fire which latter ball, 10 lbs. of powder are necessary. A pound of powder is placed inside of the ball—a fuse is attached, which will burn about ten seconds—the ball is then placed in the gun with the fuse turned from the powder. When it is fired, the flames enveloping the ball sets fire to the fuse, which is intended to explode the ball after it is buried in the object. Of the devastating effects of these missiles every one has heard.

A red or sugar maple tree, in Ossipee, N. H., was blown over in a late storm, which has been for a long time a great curiosity in that neighborhood. The circumference of this tree at the ground was 23 feet, and continued about the same size for 17 feet perfectly straight and smooth. At this height it parted into two branches. The first branch extended 34 feet, and measured 51 feet from the ground 4 feet in diameter, or rather more than twelve feet in circumference—a second branch, at 56 feet from the ground measured 8 feet 9 inches in circumference. The owner has made 40 pounds of sugar from this a year, and its product now at the saw mill has just been ascertained to be 3,300 feet of inch board, and nine cords of wood for fuel.

Five years ago in the very heart, and in the suburbs of the town of Lancaster, there were, in operation at one time, twenty distilleries, most of them, if not all, had two stills running day and night, and at the same time six large breweries were in a successful tide of operation. And with what feelings of pride must every good citizen now say, that Lancaster at this present moment, presents the singular anomaly of but one or two distilleries in operation, and are doing very little indeed, as we were informed by one of the proprietors the other day, that it was scarcely worth while to heat the furnaces of a still-house.—Lancaster (Pa.) Age.

Antiquities of Central America.—We passed an hour or two most agreeably, a few days ago, in examining a number of the specimens of the antiquities of Central America, collected by our friend Mr. Norman, on his late visit to Yucatan. Mr. N. traveled in the interior of the country, and sojourned several days at Tchechen, and other places never visited by Stephens and Catherwood, and abounding in the most interesting relics of an aboriginal race, as well as in monuments yet undecayed by time, and attesting a people far advanced in civilization. The samples of statuary, sculpture, and hieroglyphical engravings, which we saw, are of the most surprising character. They are uniformly executed upon an extremely hard stone; and when we remember that not a trace of iron has been discovered in that country, and that these elaborate works have been compassed with instruments not more finished, or finer than sharpened stone, our wonder is excited at the hardy and unwearying industry that must have wrought such stupendous labor with such imperfect tools. Mr. Norman's designs of the great temple, a Tchecheuan edifice, 400 feet in length, and of a variety of mounds and monuments which he discovered almost concealed by masses of tangled and exuberant vegetation, are fraught with the deepest interest to the antiquarian and enquirer. It is his intention, we believe, to send them to one of the northern museums, in the absence of any public repertory of curiosities in this state.—N. O. Bee.

The Maine Boundary.—A letter from Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, to the Governors of Maine and Massachusetts, informs them that Lord Ashburton has full powers to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and equitable; and that he is ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line so soon as this government shall signify a readiness on its own part. The letter dwells upon the expense of surveying the line designated by existing treaty, upon the delay which must attend it, and which must necessarily postpone, for a considerable period, the settlement of the question, and adds:

"The government has agreed to make it a matter of reference and arbitration; and it must fulfil that agreement, unless another mode for settling the controversy should be resorted to with the hope of producing a speedier decision. The President proposes, then, that the Governments of Maine and Massachusetts should severally appoint a commissioner or commissioners, empowered to confer with the authorities of this government upon a conventional line, or line by agreement, with its terms, conditions, considerations, and equivalents, with an understanding that no such line will be agreed upon, without the assent of such commissioners. This mode of proceeding, or some other which shall express assent beforehand, seems indispensable, if any negotiation for a conventional line is to be had, since if happily a treaty should be the result of the negotiation, it can only be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification."

The Governor of Massachusetts, in answer to this letter, has said that he is already authorized by the Legislature to do whatever is necessary in the premises, and the Governor of Maine has called a meeting of the Legislature on the 18th instant.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

Cotton Seed for India.—The undertaking of raising cotton in India has not been abandoned. The Editor of the Savannah Republican says he has strong reasons for believing that the experiment is still going on—for, "as we passed along the wharf, we saw two hundred and fifty neat, iron bound casks, each of which would contain about two bushels, going on board the ship Aurelius—and, on inquiry, we learned they all contained cotton seed, except fifteen, which were filled with unginned Sea Island Cotton. The seed was both Upland and Sea Island; and the shippers, Messrs. A. Low & Co., informed us that it was ordered for the East Indian market; it would be re-shipped at Liverpool—and would probably be nearly a year reaching its destination."

Lead.—The St. Louis New Era of the 30th ult., states that the quantity of lead received in that city from the upper mines, since the opening of the navigation, is one hundred and forty thousand pigs, or nearly ten million of pounds. The average price of lead at St. Louis is $3,25 per one hundred pounds.

A Ludicrous Mistake.—Passengers by rail road should be careful and get into the right cars. A ludicrous mistake occurred at the depot in this town one morning last week by a neglect of such caution. A gentleman and his wife wishing to go west took seats in separate cars, the gentleman having waited until the train was starting, to transact some business. Before he had proceeded far, he found himself minus a wife, and on inquiry found that he had placed her in one of the cars of the Eastern train, and that the distance between them was increasing as rapidly as the wings of steam could accomplish it. He got out at the W. Springfield depot, and the last we saw of him he was trudging, baggage in hand, back to Springfield.—Springfield Gaz.

Fraud in the Manufacture of Salt.—A correspondent of the Cultivator makes a statement of interest to all purchasers of salt. He says that the manufacturers in the Western part of the State, are in the habit of introducing large quantities of lime, for the purpose of giving it that beautiful white appearance for which New York salt is so celebrated. He says, as a proof of this, that a few weeks since he put down several barrels of pork, very sweet at the time of packing, used over one bushel of salt, (so called,) to every two hundred pounds of meat, and covered it with a very strong brine. Some three or four weeks afterwards, upon examination, he found it nearly worthless. The meat appeared to be literally covered with lime, and was utterly unfit for table use.

Unparalleled Outrage.—On Monday last, a most atrocious outrage was committed upon the person of a poor country girl, about 16 years of age, near the village of Fulton, in this county, by 8 or 10 young men residing in this neighborhood. We have not learned the particulars, but the general features of the transaction, communicated to us, are sufficiently appalling. While walking to or from the village, the young girl was got into a barn by either force or stratagem where her person was violated by the number of men above stated—her clothes were torn to pieces and her body shockingly bruised. She was found in nearly a lifeless state, and her life is now despaired of. The young men have been arrested, and four of them examined and committed to prison in this village.—Oswego Com. Herald.

The Board of Foreign Missions.—This Society held its Anniversary at the Broadway Tabernacle yesterday, at 10 o'clock, A. M. Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen presided. After prayer by Rev. Dr. De Witt, the report was presented by Dr. Armstrong. It embodied the following results. The receipts for the first nine months have been $254,389, being an excess of $71,768 over those of the same time in the previous year. During the whole year, $303,510 have been received—a gain on the year before of $17,053.—During the year 24 missionaries have gone out, distributed as follows:

Indian Missions, West of the Mississippi,	8
Ceylon,	7
West Africa,	3
West Asia,	2
Sandwich Islands,	4

Ten missionaries have died during the year—twelve have been released, and 15 have received appointments. The whole number under the American Board is 140, with 248 assistants, and 145 native missionaries, who are supported by the Board.—The condition of the Foreign Missions is as follows:

Number of Missionaries,	503
Stations,	80
Churches,	59
Members,	20,000
Free Schools,	500
Pupils,	25,000
Pages annually printed,	50,000,000
Number of languages employed,	30
Persons speaking them,	400,000,000
Boarding Schools,	32
Pupils,	1150
Type Foundries,	5
Printing establishments,	15

There are nine missionaries among the Indians on this continent. In the

Sandwich Islands,	1
China,	1
Siam,	1
Indian Archipelago,	2
India,	5
Africa,	2
West Asia,	4
Greece,	1

The condition and prosperity of all the Indian Missions on this continent, except those in Oregon, are very good—indeed they have not been better for many years. Tribune.

Have you paid your Taxes in Michigan?—If not, look out for a squall!—A recent letter from Detroit, inserted in the Tribune, says:—

"Our land sales will take place, commencing on the first Monday in August next, at the county seats of the different counties of the State. Nearly 3,000,000 acres upon which the taxes of 1838 have not been paid, will be brought into market, and will, without doubt, be sold for a mere trifle. The sales will be absolute, and for ever barring all right of redemption by the owner of the land. It may be well to add, while on this subject, that last winter the laws regulating our system of taxation were altered. The taxes for the year 1841, and thereafter, are to be paid at the County Treasury of each county, and not as heretofore at Detroit. The taxes, after the 1st of May, inst., draw fifty per cent. interest—and after lying a certain time in the County Treasury Office, unpaid, judgment is got against the lands at the Circuit Court of the County, and they are, after due notice, sold without redemption.

The Methodist Protestant General Conference.—The Baltimore Republican says this body, which has been some weeks in session in that city, has been several days discussing the subjects of slavery and abolition. The subject came up before the conference on the presentation of memorials from Indiana, which were referred and reported upon. Yesterday afternoon, after an exciting discussion, the subject was laid upon the table, and this morning called up again. After some debate, Dr. John S. Reese, of the Maryland Conference, offered a resolution, which is in substance of the following effect:

That slavery is not in all cases a sin against God, but under certain circumstances it should be discountenanced in the church, which was carried by a vote of 23 to 20.

Mr. Norris offered a resolution that the memorial on slavery, and the report, be laid upon the table, and not be brought up again during the session of the Conference, which was lost by a tie vote of 20 to 20, several who voted for the former resolution being absent.

There are 7,500 persons in St. Louis pledged to total abstinence from liquor.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers, to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. Every stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25, those wishing to vote by proxy, can do so, by forwarding their votes to some one of the stockholders; naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting also their number of shares.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

BY ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S.,
M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S.
Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ.
Hanov., Mulii. &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

POETRY.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

A Psalm of Life.

On the rushing tide of life,
  Ever full, yet ever shifting,
Blinded with the smoke of strife,
  We like battle ships are drifting.

While the startling thunders boom,
  And wrecked barques go down forever,
In the far horizon loom
  Hopes that urge to new endeavor.

Shadows o'er the surface quiver,
  And we call them wealth and fame;
Gems of truth deep in the river
  Flash like tongues of cloven flame.

Virtues are reflected stars
  Which compel the heart to love them,
While no storm their brightness mars,
  For their home is high above them.

Heaven gives glory to the water!
  Lo! yon crimson clouds that seem
Like war-banners bathed in slaughter,
  All are painted in the stream.

And, enshrined in coral caves,
  Deeds of love on diamonds gleaming
In their deep, transparent graves
  Like sweet infants brightly dreaming.

Grief, a willow, stands and weeps
  O'er the wave itself hath shaded
And its silent vigil keeps
  When the light of day hath faded.

Memory, with her finger placed
  On her lip the past is reading,
In that magic mirror traced,
  Far remote and still receding.

THE MERCHANT AND HIS DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

It was a cold stormy evening in December—the snow fell in flakes fast and thick—the wind whistled mournfully through the trees, striking a chill to the heart of the pedestrian, as with difficulty he wended his way through the snow already fallen.—Not a star was to be seen, and all seemed dark and gloomy save where occasionally the feeble light from the street lamp fell on the immediately surrounding objects. The great thoroughfares of the metropolis, which some hours before had been thronged with people, were now almost wholly deserted. I had been called upon to visit a patient and was now returning home, when wrapping my cloak more closely around me, I quickened my pace—anxious to escape, in part, at least, the fury of the storm. I proceeded along the great thoroughfare, and was on the point of turning the corner of another street, when my attention was arrested by the sobbing of a child. I stopped and turning round, beheld a small boy, apparently about eight years of age, with scarcely rags enough to cover his almost frozen body. He was shivering with cold, and to my enquiry of where he lived, could hardly answer.

'And what are you doing here at this late hour?'

'I am trying to beg of the gentlemen a few cents, to buy some food for my sick mother. Oh, sir please give me a few cents, do!'

I was struck with the sorrowful tone of the child, which convinced me that he was no impostor, and sheltering him from the storm as I easily could with a part of my cloak, I asked—

'Is your mother very sick?'

'O, yes, sir—she is very sick and has nothing at all to eat, nor no money to buy it with.'

'No money! Why, how do you get the medicine that the doctors order?'

'Mother has no doctor, sir. My sister Mary says he would not come because he was afraid mother would never be able to pay him.'

'No doctor, neither! Come my lad,' said I still sheltering him from the storm with my cloak, 'come, show me where your mother lives, and I will see that she has something to eat and a doctor, too.'

We started, and I followed him up one street and down another, until we came to a small narrow alley, lighted with great difficulty, through the mud and snow that had accumulated, we at last stopped before an old dilapidated building, one which had semingly withstood the test of years, but which now tottered beneath the heavy gusts ever and anon, that swept whistling through the dark and narrow street. My little guide opened the door, and we entered, groping our way through the dark, until we came to an old broken pair of stairs, that cracked and shook beneath our steps as we ascended. Having reached the landing, from which the door opened into the room where the boy informed me his mother lay, I stopped, whilst I sent him forward to acquaint his mother and sister of my presence. Lifting the latch softly he entered, leaving the door open behind him.

I stepped back a pace or two, and stood for a moment to contemplate the interior of the apartment; and oh! what a sight was presented to my view! It was a sight that would have melted a heart of stone.

On a bed in one corner of the room, with a single blanket as a covering, lay a sick woman; whilst near her, on the only chair, and indeed with the exception of an old shackling bench, the only seat that was visible in the apartment—sat a girl about ten or eleven years of age, who had been reading in a book which she held in her hand. The remnant of an old carpet was on the floor; a few cooking utensils hung against the wall; and a stool, an old broken mirror, and a kind of wooden chest or trunk, completed the furniture. I had in the course of my professional career, visited many scenes of distress—many abodes of misery and want; but then they were always coupled with filthiness and obvious neglect. Here it was different—cleanliness and order prevailed through the room, indeed to a much greater extent than could have been expected in so old a fabric, where the snow and rain drifted in at every gust of wind, chilling the room to such an extent, that the few dying embers in the chimney scarcely could be felt.

The boy stepped out and requested me to enter.

'This is the kind gentleman, mother,' said he as we approached her bed.

The woman whispered something which was drowned by a gust of wind that shook the house to its foundation, and drove the snow and sleet through the cracks and crevices that were visible on every side. It was evident from the expression of her countenance, that it was thanks she was whispering for a gleam of blended melancholy and joy stole across her face, and a faint smile played about her mouth, which was as pretty a one as ever I had seen. Indeed, from her appearance, she had been, when in health, extremely beautiful. Her eyes were black, and even in sickness retained a brilliancy that is seldom seen; her hair was a dark auburn; and her lips thin, and with a natural curl when corresponding with a nose of Grecian shape formed a model of beauty, even amid the poverty that surrounded her. Her children too, inherited their mothers beauty, and unlike the generality of poverty's children, were mannerly, even to politeness.

I made known to her the fact that I was a physician, and requested her to let me feel her pulse. It was low and feeble, as might have been expected, from her not having had for a week past, scarce food enough to sustain life. I was about to order some refreshment but I suddenly recollected myself. I bade them be of good cheer until morning, when the storm being somewhat abated, I would return, prepared to aid them. I descended the tottering stairs by aid of the boy, and was soon again braving the fury of the storm, which still raged with unabating violence. Wrapping my cloak more closely around me, and quickening my pace, I soon reached home; and when on retiring to rest I listened to the pattering of the snow and hail against the window, and the now whistling, now hollowing sound of the wind, as it swept along, I shuddered to think of the poor woman and her children, with scanty clothing and an untenantable home.

Next morning I acquainted my wife with the circumstances of the case, and she immediately set about preparing some articles of apparel, and other necessaries, whilst I set out to visit my patients, and to procure some medicine for the sick woman, whose name I learned was Mrs. Williams.

By the time I returned, she had them prepared, and ordering the carriage, we proceeded to find our way to the street in which the poor woman lived. Driving to the place where I met the boy on the preceding evening, we followed as well as I could remember, the route that he had led me, turning up one street and down another, until we at last arrived at the house, or fabric, which I could only remember from its dilapidated looks.

We were welcomed at the door by the smiling face of the little fellow, who was beautiful even in his rags; and on entering the room, we passed the little girl, who exclaimed—

'O, sir, how glad I am you've come.—We were afraid you had forsaken us, too, like our'—but a look from her mother prevented her from expressing herself, and she concluded—'had forsaken us too.'

Struck with the beauty and naive of the girl, my wife had not observed the look that arrested her expression, I had, and I determined to fathom the painful secret, for such it appeared to be to the woman, whose eyes filled with tears as the girl was about to disclose it. I concluded, however, to let it rest until some other time, and giving some directions as to administering the medicine. I took my leave. In about half an hour, I sent my carriage and my wife returned. She told me she had given the medicine to Mrs. Williams, and had clothed the children. She had also purchased some things at a grocery on her way home, which she had ordered to be sent to them as soon as possible.

'And I hope,' she added, 'that they are now more comfortable.'

On the following morning I again visited them and found them as my wife had hoped much more comfortable, and Mrs. Williams somewhat better. On leaving them I beckoned the little girl to follow me, and when we had got down stairs, I asked her who she alluded to on the preceding day. At first she seemed to hesitate, but upon my promising not to let her mother know that she told me, she answered:

'It was my grandfather, sir.'

'Your grandfather?'

'Yes, sir, it was my grandfather. And mother says he is very rich and has a great many ships, but mother does not like us to mention it.

'And why not, my girl?' Why does he not help your mother?' I asked.

'Oh, sir, mother says it is because she married poor father; who is dead now!'

The truth at once flashed upon my mind. Mrs. Williams had been deserted by her father for marrying the man she loved. I asked the girl her grandfather's name, and she mentioned one that made me start; it was the name of one of the most wealthy merchants. I was somewhat acquainted with him, and knew him to be an open hearted and generous man. I had even known him to visit in person the abodes of the poor and needy, and I determined it should not be long ere he should be made acquainted with the wants of one whose near relation claimed his care, let her fault be what it might. I knew from what the little girl told me that he had been inexorable, and that if he knew for whom I solicited, he would refuse; for long and deep is a father's dislike for a child who has disobeyed him. I therefore resolved not to mention the name of the object of my solicitations, but simply to represent her case and get him to accompany me to her residence.

On the second day following that on which the little girl told me of her grandfather's circumstances and name, I drove up to the door of his elegant mansion, situated in one of the most fashionable streets of the city, I enquired if he was at home, and was answered in the affirmative. I was shown into his library, where he sat reading the papers of the day.

'Mr. D——,' said I as I entered, 'I have presumed upon our acquaintance, knowing you to be a man of benevolence and feeling, to solicit your aid in behalf of a poor sick widow, who with two children, reside in the lower part of the city. They are entirely destitute, and in this cold weather have neither wood nor clothes to keep them warm. The old house, too, in which they live, is scarcely tenantable, and they have to depend, from day to day, upon the charity of strangers; the boy being too small to work, and the girl having to attend to her sick mother.'

I might have added 'Her relations are wealthy but refuse to aid her;' or I might have disclosed his name at once, but I did not, for fear he might refuse his aid. In the first place, I thought he might mistrust, although it could hardly be expected, as the little girl told me he had not heard from them for some years back; consequently he knew not whether she was yet alive, or what had become of her. In the second I knew he would peremptorily refuse.

As I have said, I did not inform him of the particulars of the case, but simply asked him to accompany me to her dwelling, that he might see for himself, her situation. He immediately consented, and jumping into my carriage, we were soon rolling towards the house.

As we proceeded on our way, my mind reverted to the scenes I had witnessed.—The one of splendor and magnificence from which an only daughter had been banished, for wedding one she loved but whom her father had deemed unfit for her, on account of his pecuniary circumstances—the other an abode of poverty and distress, where penury and want were endured by one who had forsaken father, friends and home, for the love of him to whom she had entrusted her happiness. Such is a father's enmity to an offending child. The one forsakes his only child regardless of her fate; the other clings to her only love, enduring a father's curse, rather than retract her plighted vows.

We had now arrived at the house, and as we descended from the carriage my heart almost failed within me, for I trembled for the consequences of this visit.—However, I ascended the stairs, he following. I opened the door without knocking, and entered with him precipitately, trusting rather to the feeling of the moment to accomplish my object, than to a more slow, though perhaps not more sure course. As we entered, Mrs. Williams, who had got considerably better, rose from a chair on which she had been sitting, to receive us. She at once recognized her father, and the next instant was rushing into his arms.

At first he attempted to thrust her from him, but from weakness or excess of joy, she fainted on his bosom, and then it was that paternal feeling triumphed;—and tears, thick and fast, flowed in torrents upon the almost lifeless form of his only child.

I had until now stood aloof, when catching up a pitcher of water from the table, I commenced bathing her temples; whilst her father in agonizing tones, called upon her name, as though his voice alone would recall her dormant senses. Slowly she recovered, and opening her dark and expressive eyes, she faintly whispered,

'Father!'

Tears again rushed from the old man's eyes, and he exclaimed—

'My daughter, I am not worthy of that name. But oh!' forgive me!'

'It is I, father, who should ask forgiveness,' said Mrs. Williams. 'Come, come, Charles,' said she to the little boy, who had just entered, 'come, Mary, you too ask grandfather's forgiveness for your mother.' The old man caught his grandchildren in his arms, and wept over them like a child. Need it be said that in a few weeks in one of the splendid parlors of his magnificent mansion, might be seen Mrs. Williams and her two rosy children, no more attired in the humble garb of poverty, nor wo-stricken in countenance, but blest with a father's and grandfather's love, living truly contented and happy.

ROBERT POLLOK,

AUTHOR OF THE "COURSE OF TIME."

The Rev. Robert Pollok, the author of the celebrated poem, "The Course of Time," was a native of this parish, Eaglesham.)—His father, John Pollok, (aged eighty-two years,) is still alive. His mother was Margaret Dickie, from the Parish of Fenwick. His ancestors had for many generations been proprietors of a property called Horse Hill, in the above parish. The name of the former proprietor was Gemmel, the last of whom, the grandmother of Mr. Pollok, was a female, who married a person of the name of Dickie, of which marriage, the mother of the bard was a daughter. This family suffered greatly during the persecution, and it was chiefly from the details of these sufferings, collected from the lips of his mother, that Mr. Pollok was led to the composition of that very interesting sketch, "The Persecuted Family." No trace of the period of Mr. Pollok's birth is to be found in the parish records. It appears, however, that he was born in the year 1799, at Muirhouse, a farm of about one hundred acres, scarcely three miles west of the village of Eaglesham, then, and still in the possession of his father, John Pollok, a tenant of the Earl of Eglington. He was baptized by Mr. Thompson, Antiburgher minister at Mearns. Mr. Pollok obtained his early education at Langloe, at a school supplied by various teachers, who taught only for a stated period during the summer months, and returned in the winter to college. He was also for some time at a school at Newton-Mearns. At first he seems to have had no idea of pursuing the clerical profession. For some time he assisted his father on the farm, but, finding the laborious duties of an "upland farmer" to be too arduous for his feeble constitution, he resigned the sickle and plow, and went to reside at Barrhead, with David Young, a brother-in-law, for the purpose of learning the trade of a carpenter; but after fabricating with his own hands a few chairs and other trifling articles, he seems also to have sickened at the idea of sacrificing himself to the pursuit of a mere manual employment, and we accordingly find him next residing with his uncle, Mr. David Dickie, at Fenwick, where he learned Latin and Greek with Mr. Farlie, the present parish teacher. Mr. Pollok afterwards studied at the University of Glasgow, where, after the usual curriculum, he took his degree of Master of Arts. He studied theology in the same city under Dr. Dick, the Professor of Divinity for the United Secession church. At this period he seems also to have attended the theological lectures of Professor Macgill, in the University. In the spring of 1827, he was admitted by the United Associate Presbytery of Edinburgh, a licentiate of the Secession church, along with his brother, who still remains a preacher, belonging to that body. Mr. Pollok preached only once for Dr. Brown, of Rose street Chapel, Edinburgh, and once or twice for Dr. Belfrage, at Slateford. The fatal disease, consumption, which was soon to settle his earthly ministrations, and all other labors, was now settling down upon him.—He went for a short time to reside in Aberdeen, but without any sensible improvement in his health, and therefore soon returned to the hospitable abode of his friend, Dr. Belfrage. During Mr. Pollok's residence at Slateford, he was visited by many distinguished individuals, and received the advice and friendly intercourse of Dr. Abercrombie, of Edinburgh, and was also on intimate terms with the family of Dr. Monro, of the University of Edinburgh, who then possessed the pleasant villa of Craig-Lockhart, in the vicinity of Slateford. But in spite of every effort on the part of his friends and medical advisers, the symptoms of the disease continued to advance, and at length it became evident that the only chance of saving a life so valuable, was a residence in Italy. The city of Pisa, in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, was selected for his residence. In August, 1827, he left Scotland for the purpose of proceeding on his journey, accompanied by his sister, (now Mrs. Gilmour, residing in the village of Eaglesham,) from whom the author obtained most of the particulars here recorded. He proceeded first to Plymouth, and then took up his residence near to Southampton. Here the symptoms increased so rapidly, that it was found impossible to proceed further.—The ill-fated bard continued to linger on till the 18th of December, 1827, when he expired in the arms of his sister. Mrs. Gilmour speaks highly of the kindness of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, rector of a parish in the neighborhood, and also of the attention paid to her brother by Mr. Lloyd, of Dublin.—These gentlemen frequently cheered and consoled him by their presence and conversation, and occasionally brought grapes and such other delicacies as were thought most agreeable. Mr. Wilson conversed much with Mr. Pollok on spiritual matters, and seemed to take a deep interest in him. Mr. Pollok, during his illness, as may be supposed, exhibited every symptom of being a devout and sincere Christian. He was buried in the parish of Millbrook, Southampton, according to the English ritual. His mother died two years before, aged sixty-six. Of a writer so popular, and so justly admired as a poet, it is unnecessary to say more than that he holds an eminent place as a man of genius, among the many eminent characters which his native country has produced. But at present, it is our duty not so much to applaud his genius as to state a few statistical facts—all that can be expected in a limited report. His brother, the Rev. David Pollok, is now engaged in preparing memoirs of the poet, to be published in two volumes; the first volume containing the life, and the second, letters, posthumous poems, and other writings. Mrs. Gilmour states that "The Course of Time" emanated from the exuberant fancy of her brother in about two years; and also that the poet, about the period of its publication, destroyed all his moral crude and early productions.—From the New Statistical Account of Scotland.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES,
AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the amount used than any other medicine ever offered to the public. Those upon the brink of the grave have been called to health by its powerful effects, the weak have become strong, and the consumptive man has been cured of his pale cheek and haggard look and racking cough Should the incredulous doubt, let them try it and if it fails to cure, you shall have it free of expense. We have in our possession recommendations from some of the most distinguished men of the age which we shall be glad to show at any time.

PARKER'S PULMONARY BALM.

One of the best medicines for common colds Influenzas &c. &c. &c., to be found in the whole catalogue of patent medicines. Give it a try, it is first rate, call and read one of his circulars.

MAGNETIC ODONTICA.

THE TEETH! THE TEETH!

The Incomparable Tooth Preparation.

THE fact is proved, and the most incredulous and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds. Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC,

FOR the cure of RING BONE, SPAVIN, WIND GALLS, &c. &c. ☞A certain cure in all cases.☜ Many certificates can be shown, and will be if wished; to place this inestimable specific as a perfect cure, beyond a doubt.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and use administered to more than 18 000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

Strictures on Br. T. B. B's Remarks, no 5, current Volume, on the phrase "mia toon Sabbatoon."

MR. EDITOR;—The first thing I shall notice as objectionable in the article above referred to, is the want of a proper expression of the difference between the singular and plural in Greek by correspondent words in the Roman character. This Br. writes the singular and plural in the same way; viz: "sabbaton," making no difference between the short vowel, "omicron," and the long vowel, "omega," which throws an obscurity over the whole subject. To prevent this, it seems to me highly proper and necessary, that when "omega" occurs in Greek, it should be expressed in Roman by doubling the vowel, viz. oo Hence, the genitive plural of "sabbaton" should be written "sabbatoon," which would distinguish it from the singular as clearly as the nominative plural is distinguished from the singular by being written "sabbata." To an intelligent reader, though unacquainted with Greek, this stricture will appear important.

I will next observe that the remarks of Br. B. on the language used by the New Testament writers, appear to express rather too much. If he had said that something of the Hebrew idiom appears in their style of writing, he would have stated the real fact. But it seems to me to be affirming too much to say "the idiom is essentially Hebrew." I have a similar objection to the unqualified statement, that "the New Testament is not classic Greek." It would have been saying enough to have stated that it is not purely classic Greek." It appears from the 6th of Acts, that the languages commonly spoken in Judea by the Jews, at the commencement of the Christian era, were Hebrew and Greek. And for the accommodation of the latter, together with the multitudes of other nations who spake the Greek language, the New Testament, (with the exception, perhaps, of Matthew's gospel,) was written in Greek.

Again; I think he has failed to show that "mia," the cardinal member in Greek is sometimes used for "prote," the ordinal. He admits that it is not ordinarily so used, but claims that is so used sometimes; and hence concludes that mia is rightly translated first in Matt. xxviii. 1, and other places where the phrase, "the first day of the week," occurs in the common version. In proof of this, he states that "those who are learned in Hebrew inform us, that in the account of creation, we read in the original, "the evening and the morning were one day, two day, three day," &c. I can not think this quite correct, for Professor Bush in his commentary on the Book of Genesis, (which is a learned and very critical work,) renders the passage first referred to, "and there was evening, and there was morning, one day." And he then cites Josephus as observing that "this was indeed the first day; but Moses calls it one day, the cause of which I am able to give even now; but because I have promised to give such reasons for all things in a treatise by itself, I shall put off its exposition till that time." To which the Professor adds, "he evidently considered the phrase as having in this connection something of a peculiar sense," which, from various facts, he supposes to be that of "certain, peculiar, or especial," denoting "a period of indefinite length." However this may be, it will appear from his rendering of the Hebrew, and the remarks of Josephus, that one is not here used for first, although the period of time referred to was in reality the first day. The distinction between the cardinal and the ordinal number is in no wise confounded, but clearly preserved "And there was evening and there was morning, one day."

He further cites an old Syriac calendar, furnished by antiquarians, which expresses the days of the week in the following manner, viz. "one of the Sabbath, two of the Sabbath, three of the Sabbath," &c. But admitting the correctness of this statement concerning the ancient method of expressing the order of the week in that language, it furnishes no proof of the point in question; for the obvious meaning of it is, one day out of, or from the Sabbath; two days out of, or from the Sabbath; three days out of, or from the Sabbath," &c. Although the periods thus marked are otherwise expressed by the first, second, and third days of the week; it will not follow that the cardinal number is properly rendered by the ordinal.

Hence, he offers nothing from ancient usage, as I perceive, of any weight, in favor of rendering the phrase under consideration, "the first day of the week," as in the common version, so long as the literal rendering is, by his own concession, "one of the Sabbaths." If this be in fact the literal rendering, (which none will dare deny,) it ought to be adopted, unless there be an absolute necessity, (which is not the case,) for departing from it.

Br. B. observes that "the expression is evidently used to designate the particular time when the women visited the sepulchre; and thinks this "exactness" is destroyed by the proposed amendment, i. e., by translating the phrase literally. This is rather curious, that a strict rendering of the Evangelists words should leave us in the dark as to their meaning! But is it in fact so? Let us look again at the literal rendering of Matt. xxviii. 1. "In the end of the Sabbaths, as it began to dawn towards one of the Sabbaths," &c., alluding, as appears by the connection and the circumstances of the case, to one of the "seven Sabbaths complete" appointed by the law, measuring "seven weeks" from the time of the first paschal Sabbath to the feast of Pentecost. I am not able to see but that the expression, "as it began to dawn towards one of the Sabbaths," i. e., weeks, marks the time of the women's visit to the sepulchre, (to a Jewish ear at least, especially if the first paschal Sabbath that year occurred on the same day with the weekly Sabbath,) as definitely as the common rendering, viz. "as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week." The dawn towards one of the specified Sabbaths, or weeks, was really the dawn towards the first day of the week after the Sabbaths referred to, and is sufficiently designated as such: and if it were not as clearly marked by this as by the other phraseology, we ought to be satisfied, seeing it is the very language of the inspired historian. It will not, therefore, follow, as Br. B. infers, that "so far as any definite information is conveyed by it, we might as well have been told that somewhere between Passover and Pentecost, the women visited the sepulchre, and found their Lord had left it."—The morning marked is obvious the first morning after the Sabbaths to which the writer alludes.

But we shall find a manifest want of explicitness and precision in the language of the Evangelist according to Br. B's explanation of the subject. He would render sabbaton which is confessedly the Greek word for Sabbath by the single term week. And the only example which he gives to justify this departure from its primitive meaning, is that, Luke xviii. 12, in which the Pharisee said, "I fast twice in the week," literally, "twice of the Sabbaths." He thinks the primitive meaning is not admissible here; but he has failed to convince me that it is not. For the Pharisees had their peculiarities. And hence, allowing the Sabbath to have been generally observed as a fast day by the Jews, as he alleges, this austere man might have observed it as a fast, by abstaining from two of the regular meals. But if reference be had to the fasts which are said to have been observed on the second and fifth days of the week, the word, Sabbath, here may still retain its primitive meaning, without any material difficulty. The sense, in that case, would be that he fasted twice from one Sabbath to another. I can, however, see no reason for relinquishing the first exposition. But if we should relinquish it, and allow that sabbaton is rightly translated week, this would not warrant us in confounding the plural with the singular by rendering sabbatoon, in the phrase in question, which is plural, by the single term, week. By this method of translating, which Br. B. advocates, the Evangelists are made to use the plural for the singular —to mean week, when they say weeks, or literally Sabbaths: Is there not a want here of exactness which we can hardly conceive attributable to them. If there were but a single blunder of this kind, we might, perhaps, account for it, by supposing it to be an error in copying, or an inadvertance. But the plural is frequently used, where, according to Br. B's views, and the common version, the meaning is singular. Sabbaths, or weeks are plural in the texts; but they are translated week.—This can not appear reasonable. If sabbaton may be rendered week, then sabbatoon which is plural should be rendered weeks. And if mia in the above phrase is used for prote, then the clause containing it should be rendered, "as it began to dawn towards the first of the weeks." "This is clear and certain, which would be coming to the very point from which Br. B. starts back, as leaving us wholly in the dark as to the real time of the women's visit to the sepulchre. Most evidently, "the dawn towards the first of the weeks," is no more definite than the "dawn towards one of the weeks." Hence, there is nothing gained as to the exactness of the narrative, by departing from the literal rendering, unless we allow that the inspired historians made no difference between weeks and week, which would be attributing to them a carelessness incompatible with their character and office.

Br. B. concludes that the literal rendering of this phrase "would probably not be very objectionable, if it concerned no other places than Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2." And I think I have shown that it is not objectionable as it concerns Matt. xxviii. 1. Neither will it be found objectionable as it concerns Mark xvi. 1, Luke xxiii. 56, and John xix. 31, although mention is made only of the Sabbath's being past, (in the singular,) whereas Matthew speaks of the end of the Sabbaths. All which can be inferred from this is, that the three first evangelists were not as particular as the last in recording the observance of the paschal Sabbath; but deemed it sufficient to record the keeping of the weekly Sabbath, which was the more important institution. Such an omission creates no more difficulty than the omission of various other events by some of the sacred historians which are noted by others.

I am far from thinking that the proposed correction in the translation of the above phrase is indispensably necessary to refute the argument from the resurrection for the observance of a first day Sabbath. That argument, allowing all which the common version implies, is multiplied by the fact that there is no divine designation of the first day of the week as the weekly Sabbath instead of the seventh, which was originally appointed. Nevertheless, the triumph of truth over error is rendered the more conspicuous by a literal rendering of what the inspired words affirm. Something is hereby manifestly gained. Because the seeming force, or the force which is commonly thought to pertain to the argument from the resurrection, is hereby destroyed.

The commandment is more especially important as it concerns Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2, which are the proofs alleged in favor of an apostolical example of keeping the first day of the week; as it goes to show conclusively that the meetings alluded to were held on one of the Divinely authorized weekly Sabbaths; i. e., each was held on the seventh day of the week, and not on the first. So that all pretence of Apostolic example for a first day institution is removed.

I am happy to find that Br. B. and myself are agreed in observing the Sabbath of the fourth commandment as the only true Sabbath; but I regret that he is disposed to vindicate the common version of the phrase "mia toon sabbatoon," as it is confessedly a departure from the primitive meaning of the original, and as it contributes, not a little, to perpetuate the error which we both abominate—an error which greatly dishonors God—breaks the unity of the church—retards the conversion of the Jews—and hinders the march of the gospel through the earth.

Yours for unadulterated truth,
JABEZ CHADWICK.

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

Had Sinai, its apparatus of quailing terrors, its sublime blackness of darkness, its thunders, and tempests, and earthquakes, its sound of a trumpet waxing louder and louder, and its hosts of ministering angels—did all this appalling machinery attend the publication of the law, a merely national event, a comparatively private scene, and shall the day of judgment, when the law is to assert its high majesty, and man to have his final audit; that day of universal summoning and eternal dispensations, be wanting in circumstantial effect? Had even Bethlehem its sign and wonders, its guiding star and exulting cherubim; when he came, as in labored obscurity, could creation even then be hardly restrained from collecting her glories to grace the scene? and shall she be remiss in her attendance, when he will come on purpose to be glorified, when leave will be given her to pour her splendors in his train? And shall she not come to wait on his throne, and give effect to his triumph? Yes, we believe that the promise which he made, especially to his disciples, is destined to have universal application; that every element and every nature which sympathised in his tribulation, will then be promoted to swell his strain, or enthroned to share his glory.—"He shall come in his own glory," clad in the robe of essential light he had worn from eternity, "and in the glory of his Father," absorbing in his own person all power and office, invested by the paternal hand, with all the insignia of supreme majesty, and girt with the sword of ultimate justice, never till now unsheathed, and crowned with the most convincing signs and glorious demonstrations of paternal love; "and in the glory of his holy angels," all the bright inhabitants of heaven, forsaking their sublime occupations, and descending from their lofty seats, shall encircle his throne and attend his coming. In the presence of that splendor the sun himself shall waive, and all light be swallowed up. The vast procession, sailing on the bosom of the troubled air, filling the concave of the sky, and flanked with prepared thunderbolts of wrath, shall open its [illegible] the astonished world. No interpreter will be necessary; it will flash its conviction on every mind, find a key in every breast, explaining a thousand predictions, and realizing ten thousand apprehensions.

The sound of the trumpet is heard; it is the voice of the Judge calling for the sleeping dead, calling with a voice which is instantly heard, understood and obeyed; they that are in their graves shall come forth. Again it sounds, and unnumbered angels, true to the signal, disperse over the four winds of heaven, and collect the whole human family into the area of the great tribunal. Then shall ensue the conflagration of the globe, forsaken of its inhabitants all its stores of fire shall be unmasked, every mountain shall be a Sinai, and the flame universal, yet who shall heed the sight?—For the great assize will have begun. "Oh may the Lord grant that we may find mercy of the Lord in that day."—Harris.

FLEE FROM THE WRATH TO COME.—Oh, what a pitiful thing is it, that man will not consider this, and leave the sin and pleasure of this world, and live godly; but is so blind and mad, that he will rather have a momentary and a very short and small pleasure than hearken to the will and pleasure of Almighty God, who can take away everlasting pain and woe, and give unto him everlasting felicity! That a great many of us are damned, the fault is not in God; "God would have all men to be saved." But the fault is in ourselves, and in our own madness, who had rather have damnation than salvation? Therefore, good people, consider these terrible pains in your minds which are prepared for the wicked and ungodly: avoid all wickedness and sin; set before your eyes the wonderful joy and felicity, and the innumerable treasures which God hath laid up for you that fear and love him, and live after his will and commandments; for no tongue can express, no eye hath seen, no heart can comprehend, nor conceive, the great felicity that God hath prepared for his elect and chosen, as St. Paul witnesses. Consider, therefore, I say, these most excellent treasures, and exert yourselves to obtain the fruition of the same. Continue not, neither abide nor wallow too long in your sins, like as a swine lieth in the mire. Make no delay to repent of your sins, and to amend your life, for you are not so sure to have repentance in the end. It is a common saying, "Late repentance is seldom sincere." Therefore consider this thing with yourself betimes, and study to amend your life; for what avails it to have all the pleasures of the world for a while, and after that to have everlasting pain and infelicity?—Bishop Latimer.

MANIFESTATION OF THE SONS OF GOD.—Believers are even now the sons of God, but "the world knows them not." In this respect they are not seen. Their bodies, as well as their spirits, have been purchased by Christ, and they are becoming his members. Their bodies have, however, no marks of this divine relation, but like those of other men, are subject to disease, to death, and to corruption. And although they have been regenerated by the Spirit of God, there is still a "law of their members warring against the law of their mind." But the period approaches when their souls shall be freed from every remainder of corruption, and their bodies shall be made like the glorious body of the Son of God. Then this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and then shall they shine forth as the Son in the kingdom of their Father. It is then that they shall be manifested in their true character, illustrious as the sons of God, seated upon thrones, and conspicuous in robes of light.

THE UNCHANGEABLENESS OF THE SPIRIT.—Philosophy teaches us that no material object upon earth has a color of its own; that whatever the hue which apparently belongs to any object, it may be changed, and the object be made to take the hue of all the prismatic colors in succession. This is true, analogically, of all the things and events of this life; they are not intrinsically good or evil—do not possess a character and complexion of their own. The same dispensation may prove a curse to one and a blessing to another, may be an evil to-day and a good to-morrow, may come as a favor but be perverted and turned into a poison by our depravity, or, may come as a trial and be converted into food and life by transforming touch and smile of God.—But the gracious influence of the spirit is susceptible of no such fluctuation. Impassive itself, it is yet capable of changing every thing else, while able to impress its own character on the universe of being, it remains itself unchanged and unchangeable, the only absolute, eternal and necessary good.—Harris.

FAMILY PRAYER.—In binding a family together in peace and love, there is no human influence like that of domestic prayer. Uniting them in a common object, it unites their sympathies and their desires. Raising their hearts to heaven, it brings them altogether in the presence of God. The family altar is an asylum to which they repair from the care and toils of life. Reminding them of the rest reserved in heaven, it unites them in efforts of faith and obedience for its attainment. Earth has no holier spot than a house thus sanctified by prayer; where the voice of supplication and thanksgiving consecrates every day, where the word of God is devoutly read, and all unite to show forth all his praise.—It may be humble, but it is holy, and, therefore, heavenly. Poverty may be there, and sorrow; but its inmates are rich in faith, and joyous in the Holy Ghost. Sickness and death may enter it; but they will come as angels of peace and mercy, and the spirits whom they release from the imprisonment of the flesh, shall be united, free and happy, to worship forever, as earth did not permit them, a family in heaven.

THE EXCELLENCE OF CHRIST.—Jesus Christ is a God to whom we approach without pride, and before whom we are humbled without despair. Both Testaments refer to Jesus Christ; the former as its hope, the latter as its example, and both as their centre. The prophets had the gift of fortelling, but were never foretold themselves; the saints which followed were foretold, but had not the power of foretelling. Jesus Christ both prophesied and was prophesied of. Jesus Christ for all mankind, Moses for a single nation. The Jews were blessed in Abraham: "I will bless them that bless thee;" but all nations are blessed in Abraham's seed: "A light to lighten the Gentiles." "He has not done so to any nation," says David, speaking of the law. He has done so to all nations, may we say, speaking of Jesus Christ.—Pascal.

THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER.—It is our want of faith and love that makes our prayers a task and a burden. How often God invites us to pray! How much he promises, in order to encourage us to come to him with a holy boldness and confidence, freely and unreservedly! We need not fear to ask when God himself commands us to do so. Ardent love to God, is indeed the true spring of genuine prayer. Where this is, all other graces will follow. "Love (says one) renders prayer delightful to ourselves, and acceptable to our Maker. It makes us willing to receive."—Rev. E. Bickersteth.

THE FULNESS OF CHRIST.—Lord, the condemnation was thine, that the justification might be mine; and agony thine that the victory might be mine; the pain was thine and the ease is mine; the stripes thine and the healing balm issuing from them mine; the vinegar and gall were thine that the honey and sweet might be mine; the curse was thine that the blessing might be mine; the crown of thorns was thine that the crown of glory might be mine; the death was thine, the life purchased by it mine; thou paidst the price that I might enjoy the inheritance.—Flavel.

FIVE FACTS.—A firm faith is the best divinity; a good life the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty the best policy; and temperance the best physic.

From the Advocate of Moral Reform.

WHY DOES GOD MAKE FLOWERS?

Why, my child, He makes them that we may be happy. Don't you always feel happy when you see a beautiful flower?—You know that God wishes to make us all happy. Not content with pleasing our taste through the gratification of one sense, He has provided for the delight of another, by giving to many flowers a delicate fragrance. He who furnished us with sight and smell, has kindly adapted His fair creation to the gratification of those senses.

The flowers give a finish to this beautiful world, just as the paint gives a finish to the dwelling. What a vast variety of objects has God made, calculated to excite emotions of joy and gratitude. Some of them vast, grand, rugged—others delicate, polished, beautiful. Amid all this variety, the finishing, crowning beauty would still be wanting, if God hath not made flowers. Look at the sweet, lovely flowers, and let them talk to you. Listen to them. Do they not tell you much about the God who made you, and requires you to cherish an acquaintance with him? O how forcibly do these little spring visiters, of surpassing beauty and sweetness—how forcibly do they teach us that "GOD IS GOOD."

When we look at any work of taste, how naturally does the mind revert to the artist, and think how perfect the principle of taste must be in the mind in which it originated. I cannot begin to name the various specimens of workmanship existing in this hitherto peaceful and happy land, which draw forth our admiration of the taste and skill which gave them birth. Did you ever thus think of God? Did you ever refer all the beauty and sweetness of flowers, to a principle existing in his mind? How endless the variety of forms of beauty found in the empire of flowers. Oh, look not at the variety only, but the delicacy, the brilliancy of the tints; and while you look, let love and adoration kindle in your bosoms.

Did you ever think how pure flowers are? Not the slightest spot or stain rests upon them. Were you to discover a stain, how soon would you throw them away as worthless. You could not cleanse them—you could not remove the foul spot.—Now, my child, God's mind is just as pure as the flowers he has made. He has made your soul, and looks at it just as you look at flowers. He looks to see whether there is any spot on it. My little girl—my little boy—do you speak any improper words? do you write impure words?—or make pictures, such as God does not love to see? Do you indulge any thoughts in your mind, which would look to God, just as a foul spot would look on a sweet flower? Oh, never do any of these things again,—only think how your heart looks to God. Perhaps he will cast you away, just as you would cast away a soiled flower. Perhaps in his infinite goodness, he will wash off the foul spot in the blood of Christ. We know he will do this, if you will repent, ask forgiveness, and do the same thing no more. God can see these spots just as plain on your soul, as you could see them on a flower, and none but God can wash them away. Again, I say, bring not these marks thus early upon your soul, lest in future life they should be followed by deeper stains, which will never be washed away.

A HOME-SKETCH.

BY MRS. M. L. GARDINER.

'Was General Washington a good man?' said little George.

'Yes, my son, if there ever was one. I have often heard him pray, and seen him look up when the battle raged, as if to implore divine protection.'

'How did you like the rail-roads?' enquired Mrs. Mason.

'Very much,' replied her husband; 'the cars are very handsome and convenient, and I experienced nothing of the sensation I anticipated, but I would prefer traveling in my own private carriage. I am a great admirer of nature you know, and traveling on the rail-road you loose that pleasure.'

'Rail-roads, Steamboats, Electro-magnetic machines, and all the facilities for traveling, we owe to the immortal Washington,' exclaimed the old man. 'Where had our country been but for that man? Under God, we owe our all to him; my children! my children! you little know what dear bought privileges you enjoy.—You little know what hardships, what privations your patriotic fathers endured!'

'Grandpa,' said little George, 'if they had condemned McLeod, and we should have had another war, are the men as brave, and would they have fought as well as they did then?'

'No doubt there are many brave men, my son, many bold and fearless souls, but I doubt if there is as much genuine patriotism as existed in those days.'

'Grandpa, did you know Patrick Henry, of whom I have heard you speak so often?'

'Yes, my child, I have heard him deliver many of his eloquent speeches, when my heart has beat as if it would fly from my bosom. We were often together; his eye was keen as the young eagle's, and he would throw his whole soul into his face when he spoke; and the fire which was pent up in his bosom, like an electric flash, would illumine all around him.'

Mr. Mason looked at his wife, and smiled as his father kindled with the fire of youth, and his little boy with sparkling eyes sat watching every word and motion.

'He was first in every movement,' continued the old gentleman, 'he was like a shooting star, carrying a train of fire with him, lighting every one to freedom; his words were like matches, kindling a blaze in every direction.'

'Grandpa, did you ever see Thomas Jefferson?'

'Yes, my son, he too was a great and good man. We had a host of worthies.'

'Grandpa, who wrote the Declaration of Independence?'

'There was a committee of five ordered to prepare it.'

'Who were they?' enquired little George.

'Let me think—Jefferson, Adams, Franklin, Sherman, and Livingston. It was a glorious day, when it was unanimously adopted; it was received by the army with enthusiastic applause; a great majority of the people welcomed it with joy, which was displayed in every city, by public festivities.'

'My dear father,' said Mr. Mason, 'you are so much excited, you forget it is past your time for retirement.'

'Oh, father,' cried little George, 'I am not sleepy, and Grandpa is bright as a button; do let him tell me more.'

'No, my dear son, we had better retire, and to-morrow we will commence the subject again. Mrs. Mason, will you get the Bible?'

'Aye, do my child,' said her faher, 'and read the 46th Psalm; God was our refuge in those days of trial, let us fly to him still for safety, thanking Him for the past, and implore his mercies for time to come.'

Old Tomb-Stones.

In the article headed "Old Tomb-Stones," on our last page, an enquiry is made whether there existed so early as 1702, a Society of S. D. Baptists, in Pennsylvania. We are not able to give the precise information. We suppose, however, that there was no such society at that time. The Society of German S. D. Baptists at Ephrata was organized in 1728. The founder of the Society, CONRAD BEISSEL, embraced the seventh-day about three years before, in 1725.

About the year 1694, a controversy arose in the Protestant churches of Germany and Holland, to reform some of the errors of the church. This party was violently opposed, and were finally prohibited from promulgating their views. After this, many learned men left Europe, emigrated to America, and settled in Pennsylvania. It is probable that John and Rees Price were of that number as also Conrad Beissel.

Heresy.

There is, perhaps, no greater heresy at the present day than sectarianism; nor a greater hindrance to the progress and triumph of the church. The time has long since past when all professors founded their religious creeds from the Bible. The word of God becomes a secondary concern if used at all, and instead of being the fountain of light and wisdom, is used only as a witness, and this in detached sentences with a forced construction. Sectaries are formed more to suit the fancy and accommodate the carnal heart and feelings than otherwise.—The Bible, of itself, is univocal in teaching but one system, and this is perfectly consistent in all its doctrines and duties. All men, divested of sectarian prejudice, would arrive at the same conclusions with regard to the mind of the spirit expressed in the word. Hence it is that sectarianism is the product, not of the word of God, but of a heart unreconciled to his government.—Anxiety to build up these sects has forced men to alter the requisitions of the gospel, and the condition of membership is often made so easy that a man with an unsanctified heart can rest with perfect ease in the church, and not be called upon to bear the cross of Christ. Alas! how the glory of the church has become dim by such unholy meddling. The plain word of God has been set aside, and the "LAW," given by Him amid the thunderings and awful grandeur of Mount Sinai, as a perpetual law to govern all men in all ages, has been declared non-essential, and rejected as an idle tale. Religion is made a cloak to cover up the dark designs of the carnal heart, and a union with some church is counted a perfect safeguard to shield a man in his iniquity. Of what avail is it to admonish men to obey the voice of God, and amend their ways when the admonition is met with the plea; why, I belong to such a denomination that does not believe that is essential to salvation! How greatly unwise are such characters, and how pernicious their influence! They expose themselves to the wrath of God, and draw others into the fatal delusion. In the Judgment the inquiry will not be made, to what sect did you belong? but, how have you treated my word? The plea of having been a church member of good repute here, and of having done much to increase the numbers of that church, and of having cast out devils in the name of Jesus, will avail nothing. The will of God revealed in the sacred scriptures will be the rule of judgment, and souls will be justified or condemned as they have been obedient or disobedient to it. Away, then, with non-essentials, and men's inventions, and let God's word be Law, and let His will be done.

Power of Christianity.

One peculiar characteristic of Christianity is the power it possesses of convincing all men who will look at it of its divine character. Eighteen hundred years have the powers of darkness arrayed themselves against it. Wicked men have combined their energies for its overthrow. The fire and the sword have been called into requisition, but it stands in all its glory, increasing in its power, and diffusing far and wide its healthful influences, dispersing the darkness of Infidelity, and shedding forth the light of revelation upon benighted souls. Every effort that has been made to mar its beauty, or restrict its influence by men, or devils, has served to give it new strength and beauty, verifying the Prophet's language, that "no weapon that is formed against Zion shall prevail." Men have talked and reasoned much to cast a shadow over its glory, and make it appear as the creature of the fancy, without effect. The church is destined to stand and triumph gloriously. Its progress is onward, its power is increasing and irresistible.

Its power is irresistible, because it addresses itself to the judgment and not the fancy, the better feelings and not the corrupt passions. There is not a sceptic so lost to all perception as not to see and feel that Christianity exerts a restraining and salutary power wherever it is possessed.—A moment's glance at the reign of infidelity, and the reign of Christianity, makes the Gospel church appear glorious and divine. Wherever Christianity prevails, there all the social and moral virtues likewise prevail. And there is not an individual that comes under the influence of the Church that is not restrained from acting out fully the depravity of the heart, and prompted to some degree to its requisitions.

The power of Christianity is inseparable from the refinement and elevation of society. Just in proportion as any community or association banish from their circle the principles of Christianity, they approximate the native darkness of a barbarous state. Christianity, as it prevails, elevates man in chaste and virtuous principles and actions, and makes him understand his responsibilities, and his true character. Literature, science, and liberty, with all valuable institutions and associations of refined character, and every interesting combination of principles for the government of men in social life, or moral action, depend absolutely upon Christianity for their inception and perfection. There can be nothing refined in society, nothing pure in morals, nothing ennobling and dignified in man, nothing valuable in life, nothing peaceful in death, or glorious in eternity, that does not receive its character from the genial influences of Christianity. Heathenism with all its dire train of unholy feelings and actions, its untold cruelty and misery, its inglorious hopes and impenetrable darkness is nothing more nor less than the legitimate and certain consequence of the absence of Christianity.

It is, therefore, settled beyond the power of a cavil, that Christianity is as necessarily the light of the moral world as the sun in the heavens of the physical world, and that its presence bestows all things that are good in themselves, and influences, and its absence the certain harbinger of every thing impure and unholy, and most of all to be dreaded.

Rhode-Island.—The latest news from Rhode-Island, as we had reason to expect might be the case, are of a far more pacific character than what we published last week. It is stated, probably on authority which may be relied on as correct, that Thomas W. Dorr, acting Governor under the New Constitution, had left the house of his friend, Anthony, where he had taken up his quarters for battle, and that arrangements are in progress to furnish the people of Rhode-Island a Constitution on liberal principles.

Mental Discipline.

What is here understood by Mental Discipline is, such a treatment of the intellectual faculties, as will give them the strongest tendency to reasonably dispose of every subject which is presented to their consideration. To be convinced of the fact that the mind is not naturally qualified to subject principles to such a process, we need only to refer to our own personal observation; for we at once attach that individual's name to our list of outlaws, who is so regardless of the object of his being, and the force of his responsibility, as to act rather from policy than from principle. Hence the disquietude, dissension, and bickering so prevalent among the great mass of mankind, is attributable for the most part, to an inability to subject principles to systematic mental process.

The characteristics of an undisciplined mind are numerous, corresponding with the ever-varying temperament of different individuals. Thus, it is a prominent tendency of one mind to judge hastily, without inquiring whether there may be other considerations in connection with the subject, which, if noticed, might influence the decision.—Another is not inclined to recognize the real merit of the individual points concerned in a subject, thereby depreciating the entire matter. Others do not properly proportion the bearing which the different points connected with a subject may have in making a decision; overrating some and depreciating others. One, indeed, attributes more weight to those considerations which are favorable than they merit, and to the unfavorable, less than their real objections demand; and having decided, acts accordingly; but he finds, perhaps, when it is too late to make an alteration for the better, that he must encounter difficulties of which he had made no just estimate. Another inverts the optical instrument of his moral vision, and sees the favorable considerations in their most unfavorable, and the unfavorable in their most exaggerated forms; and in the sequel he learns that he was warranted in deciding otherwise; and that by his decision, he has obstructed the avenue through which he might have received a benefit. Another delays a decision till it is too late either to secure the advantages which might have been the result of a timely decision, or to avoid the evils which follow a neglect to decide.

There are numerous characteristics of another species. One is too credulous, often being made the dupe of the artful. Another is rigid, and set in his opinions, and can hardly be convinced by fair reasoning.—One cares for no one but himself; another attends to every one's business but his own. One is frequently pronouncing eulogics upon people in their presence—another is as often exaggerating the faults of people in their absence. One is almost always churlish and morose; another spends as much of his time in nonsense and idle laughter.—One wishes to attract attention by being gay and fashionable—another by being odd.—It is a prominent trait in one character to be haughty—in another to be vulgar—in one to be harsh and unbending—in another, to melt away into affected politeness and flattery.

If we could conceive of a circumstance under which one human being could exist independent of others of his own species, without coming in contact with the unconditional claims of the law of Nature, there would be less importance attached to the subject of Mental Discipline. But to the contrary, every individual is a member of one or more compacts, with whose interests his own are more or less identified. No one, therefore, can arrive at an erroneous conclusion without, not only effecting his own interests, but those of others, in a degree corresponding with the number and character of those compacts of which he forms a part.

There is a great variety of circumstances which govern the results of such errors.—It is therefore always difficult, and sometimes impossible to make a correct estimate of them, without the aid of Prophetic vision with which to scan the future. A person may make a wrong decision under circumstances where the result may most seriously effect the interests of those in whose welfare he ought to, and perhaps does feel the deepest solicitude. The errors of one may effect fiscal concerns, those of another, moral character, those of another, religious character. The errors of one may sweep like a tornado, wherever they reach, and then lose their force; those of another may gnaw upon posterity like a canker-worm, while he sleeps in the grave. And in short, upon the decision of one individual may hang the destiny of nations, and the fate of Empires.

A desirable state of Mental Cultivation is something that no one can inherit, neither can it be purchased with money. Our friends, however anxious they may be, cannot accomplish the work for us, neither can our dependents, however servile.

What, then, may be done? Must a man, because he finds himself apt to judge hastily, sit down contented under the impression that he, and all those with whose interests his own are identified, unavoidably stand exposed to the dangers of hasty judgment as long as he lives? Must he who is "stirred up to a sudden flood of mutiny and rage," at every insult, conclude that he must always be subject to such demonical fits of madness? Certainly not.

Mental Discipline, which is the only remedy for such evils, may regulate every mind; but the mind which is regulated by it must accomplish the work itself. For this purpose we are endowed with the God-like powers of Reason. In the course of Mental Discipline, (to which there is no particular limit) there are many processes which are humiliating, others are mortifying, but no momentary impulse should be allowed to interrupt them; and vigilance should characterize every exertion, till Reason is seated upon the throne, where she may sway her sceptre over the baser passions, and regulate the mind. FOREIGN NEWS.

From the Boston Daily Mail—Extra.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

FOURTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE

The Acadia left Liverpool on the 4th instant, and arrived at Boston early on Saturday morning.

The Foreign Securities remain firm.

The circular to Bankers, of Saturday evening, says—"The bankers who have engaged to take certain sums of money from the bank at the rate of three per cent., complain of the difficulty of employing it safely. One, in a large town, who is under no such obligation, told us that if offered £100,000 at the rate of two per cent., he would not take that sum on condition of lending it out among the manufacturers. Revival now will not be the same thing as in former years, and that the Minister ought to have known before he disturbed the commercial classes by his tariff.—Money in the discount market is really of lower value this week than it was last, for the bill-holders are offering at the rate of two and a half per cent."

In the British Parliament the public business goes on steadily, notwithstanding the efforts of the opposition. The premier is daily complimented with addreses from public bodies connected with the mercantile interests in the large sea ports, and the great measures of the government become every hour more and more assured of success. The corn importation bill was agreed to in the House of Peers by a majority of more than one hundred on each great division, in the House of Commons there have besn decisive majorities in favor of the income tax bill. Some liberals of the most prominent description, but withal men of common sense, and accustomed to practical business, declared they felt compelled to vote against their party and with the government on this measure, from a firm conviction that it was at once "bold, honest and comprehensive." The spirit of the opposition has heretofore almost wholly evaporated, and the tariff of Sir Robert Peel will shortly be a part of the commercial code of the country. The income tax bill contains 188 classes, 78 of which were disposed of in committee in one evening.

Some excitement existed at the Oxford University, in consequence of two of the professors having embraced Popery.

The number of unemployed poor at Paisley, according to the last accounts made up, was 13,327; being an increase upon the last previous account.

Nearly a whole family of children near Belfast in Ireland, had been eaten up by hogs, who, ferocious with hunger, had broken into the cabin where they were sleeping.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The French government received on Saturday evening an express from their consul at Malta, announcing the arrival there, on the night of the 25th ult. of the Great Liverpool, with important intelligence from India and China. Her dates are to the 1st of March, from Bombay, the 18th of February, from Candar, the 21st of the same month, from Jellaballabad, and the 14th of January from China.

The British in China have captured three other towns, Yapoo, Triskee, and Tunghova, which are situated within a circle, extending from 20 to 40 miles round Ningpo.

Sir Henry Pottinger, who arrived at Hong Kong on the 1st of February, had abandoned the intention of attacking Canton. He was concentrating all his forces with a view of directing them on Pekin, and had refused to negotiate with the commissioners sent to him by the emperor, being determined not to treat but with the sovreign directly.

In Affghanistan, Gen. Pollock seems to have given up all idea of forcing the Kyber Pass until he should have received the reinforcements he expected, or unless Gen. Sale, whose position was unchanged, desired his assistance.

At Ghuznee and Khelat-i-Ghilzee the British still hold the same position.

The Affghans surrounded Candahar with numerous forces, and Major Generol Nott was prepared to repulse them.

Lord Ellenborough, who reached Calcutta on Feb. 28, was immediately proclaimed governor general of India.

News of the Day.

The Lion in the Green Room.—Yesterday forenoon while the new drama, "The Lion of the Desert" was being rehearsed at the Bowery Theatre, the principal actor in the piece, the king of beasts, transcended his sphere of action by marching through the back of one of the scenes unobserved by his keeper, and availing himself of his professional privilege, strutted into the green room. Mrs. Foster, who happened to be the only member of the company at the time in the green room, (the rest being all engaged on the stage in rehearsal of a scene,) was sitting in one corner of the room reading over her part, when his majesty unceremoniously made his appearance there. The lady succeeded in making her escape, and gave the alarm to those on the stage. A great scrambling for the nearest boxes and orchestra immediately ensued, in which, we regret to say, several ladies were ungallantly left by the gentlemen to take care of themselves. Herr Driesbach came promptly to the rescue, and found the lion contemplating his majestic person in a full length mirror, seemingly debating within himself the expediency of giving instant battle to his imperial shadow; but like another great character that we have recently heard of, he so astonished himself that he actually endeavored to run away from his own presence. After two or three ineffectual attempts to make a descent from the windows, upon Elizabeth street, he was secured by his master and reduced to obedience. Perhaps there can be no better illustration of the perfect command which Herr Driesbach has over these remarkably well trained animals, than the address with which he recaptured the fugitive beast, who, on hearing the authoritative words of his tamer, instantly crouched at his feet and suffered himself to be reconducted to his den.—Courier.

A Monkey's Memory.—Authors generally seem to think that the monkey race are not capable of retaining lasting impressions; but their memory is remarkably tenacious when striking events call it into action. A monkey, which was permitted to run free, had frequently seen the men servants in the great country kitchen, with its huge fire place, take down the powder horn that stood on the chimney-piece, and throw a few grains into the fire, to make Jemima and the rest of the maids jump and scream, which they always did on such occasions very prettily. Pug watched his opportunity, and when all was still, and he had the kitchen entirely to himself, he clambered up, got possession of the well filled powder horn, perched himself very gingerly on one side of the horizontal wheels placed for the support of saucepans, right over the waning ashes of an almost extinct wood fire, screwed off the top of the horn and reversed it over the grate. The explosion sent him half way up the chimney! Before he was blown up, he was a snug, trim, well conditioned monkey as you would wish to see in a summer's day; he came down a black, carbonated nigger in miniature, in an avalanche of burning soot. The thump with which he pitched upon the hot ashes in the midst of the general flare up, aroused him to a sense of his condition.—He was missing for days. Hunger at last drove him forth, and he sneaked into the house close singed, and looking scared.—He recovered with care, but, like some other personages, he never got over his sudden elevation and fall, but became a sadder if not a wiser monkey. If ever Pug forgot himself and was troublesome, you had only to take down the powder horn in his presence, and he was off to his hole like a shot, screaming and chattering his jaws like a pair of castanets.

An Earthquake.—The Van Buren (Arkansas Intelligencer,) of the 22d ult., says: "We understand that two or three distinct tremblings of the earth was felt in our neighborhood on Wednesday morning, and that some rocks had left their whereabouts on the mountain above us, and came tumbling to the base below."

Cats.—A correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle estimates the number of cats in England at 2,732,000 and proposes that they be taxed eight shillings each, which would increase the revenue £1,087,800.

Military Greatness.—The last number of the Port Gibson, (Mississippi) Correspondent says:

"John C. O'Neil, a gentlemanly Hoosier, confined in the jail in this place for taking sundry bales of cotton which, it was strongly suspicioned belonged to some one else, has just received the gratifying intelligence that the sovereigns of his district in Indiana, have elected him Brigadier General."

Myriads of locusts have appeared within two weeks in some of the middle counties of South Carolina; their noise is almost deafening. There is an old notion there that they make their advent once in thirteen years, which it is said is the case at this time.

Canal Tolls.—The tolls collected on all the New York State Canals in each of the last four years, up to the 14th of May inclusive, in each year, are as follows:

1839,	canal opened	April	20,	$234,985
1840,	"	"	20,	190,834
1841,	"	"	24,	250,921
1842,	"	"	20,	253,734

Maine—The Boundary Question.—The Boston and New York papers of Saturday contain favorable accounts of the opening of the Maine legislature, and publish Gov. Fairfield's message. So far certainly the aspects favor an early and satisfactory adjustment of the boundary difficulties.

A letter in the Boston Atlas, dated Hallowell, May 19, says:

"The legislature of Maine met yesterday. The members manifested a good spirit. A committee of nine on the part of the Senate, and thirteen on the part of the House, were appointed to take into consideration the Governor's message. The committee voted unanimously to choose Commissioners; and by a vote of 19 to 3, adopted a resolve, offered by Col. John Otis, of the Senate, to give them full powers. The doings of the committee will be ratified by the legislature. Four Commissioners are to be designated—two from each of the political parties. Every thing is as it should be."

Wool.—The Lowell Courier says, to supply the Middlesex mills one year with wool, it requires the fleeces of 374,400 sheep! 1,200 are required every day that the mills are in operation.

Sale of Rail Roads.—Yesterday, pursuant to public notice, the sale of the Catskill and Canajoharie rail road, and the Ithaca and Owego rail road, took place at the Capitol, under the direction of the Comptroller.

The Catskill and Canajoharie rail road was knocked down, after considerable competition, for $11,600, to Mr. Amos Cornwall, of Catskill, and his associates. This road is completed for 28 miles, and is in operation to Cooksburg, 26 miles. It will undoubtedly be kept in operation as far as completed; and if not, the iron is believed to be worth more than the amount bid.

The Ithaca and Owego rail road was sold, without competition, for $4,500, to Archibald McIntyre, Esq., of this city.—This road is completed, and has been in operation for several years. Mr. McIntyre is a large stockholder in the company, and will, it is believed, repair and improve the road.

The amount loaned by the state to the Ithaca and Owego rail road, was $315,700, and to the Catskill and Canajoharie $200,000.—Albany Argus.

Mr. Saltonstall and Gov. Poindexter.—We learn by the Washington correspondence of the Boston Mercantile Journal, that Mr. Poindexter became so excited the other day, by some remarks of Mr. Saltonstall in the House of Representatives, as to write a very silly and insolent letter to Mr. S. calling him to account for an allusion made to the Custom House report.—Mr. Saltonstall said "that he should receive the statements in the report with great caution, and that he should wish to see the evidence on the subject before he placed reliance on said statement." These remarks Mr. P. took in dudgeon and wrote to Mr. S., demanding to know what he meant, and whether if he meant to insult him he intended to screen himself under the plea of being a member of the House, and that the words were spoken in debate? Mr. Saltonstall showed the letter to some of his friends; part of whom advised him to communicate it to the House, and have the writer expelled from it, that is deprived of the favor of a seat on the floor—while others advised him to take no notice of the letter or its writer, but treat both with the contempt they merited. The latter course, very wisely, Mr. S. has taken.—Salem Gazette.

Accidents.—A little boy, son of Mr. S. Pierce, of this place, was drowned yesterday noon by falling into a pork barrel at his residence on Clinton street.

It is feared that the daughter of Mr. P. T. McCollom, of Commercial street, was also drowned in the canal, as she has been missing since yesterday afternoon. She was a sprightly little girl, nearly eight years of age, and had been on board of a canal boat near her father's store to see an acquaintance, where she was missing. Her shawl and bonnet were found on board of the boat and the canal has been dragged, but she has not yet been found.

The lower floor of Messrs. Hunter, Palmer and Co's warehouse gave way yesterday evening under the pressure of 1000 bbls. of pork, which landed below without injury.—Buffalo Daily Journal.

Longevity.—Madam Wingate, of Straitham, widow of the Hon. Paine Wingate, has commenced the second century. She was born May 1st, 1742. On Monday, May 2, she received company, appeared cheerful during the afternoon, took tea with her visitors, and seemed to receive pleasure from their society as well as afford gratification to her friends.—Exeter News Letter.

Bermuda papers state that at the Court of General Assize, there was not an indictment or civil suit for the jury to try. This is the first instance of the kind on record. An immense majority of the inhabitants of this Island were emancipated from Slavery in 1833, the planters preferring immediate emancipation to the apprenticeship system.

In a manufacturing town of New England, a learned shoemaker adopted as his motto, and had inscribed upon his sign, the familiar latin quotation, "mens conscia recti." A competitor who lived opposite, seeing that the sign of his rival attracted much curiosity and custom among the literati of the town, and not to be outdone in keeping up with the latest fashions, threw the whole population one morning into convulsions of laughter, by having placed over his shop door in glaring capitals—"men's and women's consci recti."

Mr. Van Zandt Acquitted.—We learn that the Ecclesiastical Tribunal, which had the case of Mr. Van Zandt under consideration, has acquitted that personage of the crime for which his connection with Grace Church was severed, and of which he was convicted by the Circuit Court in Rochester. The Ecclesiastical Court is thus in conflict with the civil tribunal; and what the upshot may be, it is difficult to determine. Guilty or innocent, his punishment in exposure to the world is severe enough.—Roch. Eve. Post.

Arrival of Missionaries.—Intelligence has been received (by a letter from Miss Miranda Vinton to her father at Wilmington,) of the safe arrival of the ship Louvre at Maulmein, with the company of missionaries consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. Chandler, Miss Vinton, and the Chinese, Avung. They sailed from Boston on the 14th of Sept. last, and arrived at Maulmein on the 11th of January, having had an unusually short and pleasant voyage. The missionaries were all well.—Christian Sec.

Failure of the Niger Expedition.—The brig Uncas, at Boston on Wednesday evening from Sumatra, touched at Ascension March 22d, and left steamer Niger, one of the British Government vessels employed in the Niger Expedition, which, it appears, had totally failed, after two separate attempts, owing to the unhealthiness of the climate. The crews of most of the vessels were sick or dead.—N. Y. Express.

A Large Proprietor.—Stephens, the traveler, mentions in his work on Central America, a planter who owns 200,000 acres of land, 10,000 head of cattle, 1,000 mares and mules, 700 horses, 4 volcanoes, 7 large rivers, and 300 boiling springs. From the top of the volcanoes, the owner can light his pipe, and see the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans at one view!

Female Moral Reform Society.—The following is the substance of the Annual Report made to this society:—

The annual report was read, and it stated that 15,569 Advocates were printed monthly, and 209,000 in the last year.—Since the society started, they had printed 2,400,000 pages, warning women against seduction, and men against that vice and impurity. There were 560 auxiliary societies, but they were not so active as they had been. They had sent 40,000 petitions to the New York Legislature, and at last got a response in the shape of an able report from the Judiciary Committee, condemning the shocking violation of the 7th commandment carried on all over the country, but particularly in New York, Albany, and Washington! And next year, no doubt, the Legislature of this State, and perhaps Congress, would pass wholesome laws to punish and put a stop to this vice for ever. The committee in reporting had deep cause to deplore the alarming increase and extent of this vice in this city. In the eighth ward alone there were ninety-seven houses of ill fame; these, allowing an average of seven abandoned females to every house, gave an aggregate of 679 depraved public women in that ward alone. Carrying out this calculation through the seventeen wards, would give an aggregate of 1649 dwellings devoted to this most horrible vice; and 11,543 young women of ill fame, fellow beings whose mode of livelihood was a loathing and a curse. And this, the report went on to say, was a very low estimate; for in four other wards, the 3d, 5th, 6th, and 15th wards, (as we understood it,) the average of these dens of iniquity, and these shameless women, were as three to one when compared with the 8th ward. (Great sensation.)

The following statistics were then given:

Families visited,	6,507
Advocates published,	16,115
Pages distributed,	47,052
Signed the temperance pledge,	710
Signed the petition to the Legislature for the suppression of this vice,	2,783
Hopeful conversions of young women,	65

Thus it appears we have now in the U. S. thirty-seven towns containing over ten thousand inhabitants, and fifty-two towns containing over eight thousand.—Ohio Observer.

Old Newspapers.—The oldest living paper in America is the New Hampshire Gazette. It was established by Daniel Fowle at Portsmouth in August, 1757. It was originally printed on half a sheet of foolscap, quarto, as were all the papers of that day; but was soon enlarged to half a sheet crown folio, and sometimes appeared on a whole sheet of crown. It is now in its 88th year, and is a well conducted paper of goodly dimensions.

The oldest living newspaper in England is the Lincoln Mercury, first published in 1695. The oldest paper in Scotland is the Edinburg Evening Courant, of 1700. The oldest in Ireland is the Belfast News Letter of 1737.—N. Y. Mechanic.

It seems remarkable to this generation, which is so accustomed to the agency of newspapers, that the world would have gone on, from the beginning of time down to the revolution which subsided into the English commonwealth, without their aid. The first thing of the sort, of which we have any notice, is said to have been issued at Venice in the year 1531, being 90 years before the Plymouth settlers came over; and one of the etymologies of the word Gazette refers it, as we learn by a recent history of periodical literature, to the name of Venetian coin, gazette, for which the sheet was sold. It was issued monthly, in manuscript, by the Government. The first English periodical of the kind is said to date from 1588, when the Spanish Armanda was in the channel, and this was the only periodical publication in England for twenty-five years. In the year 1642 no less than 20 were established, with such titles as these, viz: "News from Hull," "Truths from York," "Warranted Tidings from Ireland," the "Secret Owl," and Mercuries of all sorts.

There is in the Cabinet of the Antiquarian Society at Worcester a specimen of an English newspaper published in 1660, the year of the Restoration. It was issued weekly in London on two small quarto sheets, entitled, Mercurius Publicus, comprising the sum of Foreign Intelligence; with the affairs now in agitation in England, Scotland, and Ireland. For information of the people. Published by order. According to the foregoing note, the Lincoln Mercury, which is still living, was established about thirty years afterwards. The first paper appears to have been established in France in 1631.

In the year 1703, a weekly paper was established in Boston called the "Boston News Letter, published by authority," by Bartholomew Green; which appears to have been the first newspaper published in this country. 1719 the Boston Gazette was established. A third paper, the New England Courant, was issued in Boston in 1731 by James Franklin, in which office "our Ben" served his apprenticeship, and made his first appearance as a writer.—Soon after the New Hampshire Gazette was established, and we are surprised to learn by the above notice that it still continues to be published. The first American newspaper published out of Boston, however, was the American Weekly Mercury, established in Philadelphia by Andrew Bradford, in December, 1719. Wm. Bradford established the New York Gazette in October, 1728.

Up to the year 1750, besides the seven papers in Boston, the whole number in the country was thirteen. The first paper south of Philadelphia was the Maryland Gazette, printed at Annapolis in 1728.—The South Carolina Gazette was established in Charleston in 1731, and the Virginia Gazette was published in 1736. The first periodical published in New Jersey was the New American Magazine printed at Woodbridge for two years from 1759, under the editorship of Judge Nevil, of the Supreme Court. But we have not room to pursue the subject to-day. The rapid increase of the country may be estimated in some degree by the fact that the number of newspapers now published in the country is said to be rising of fifteen hundred—double the number actually wanted or properly supported.—Newark Sentinel.

The Creoles Liberated.—The following paragraph is from the correspondence of the Express, dated Nassau, N. P., April 16, 1842.

A special session of the Admiralty Court convened this day to hear the charge of piracy against the seventeen negroes imprisoned from the Creole. The Attorney General made his motion for delay of trial, on the ground that it was impossible to obtain the necessary evidence here, and offered for the perusal of the Court a number of affidavits of the captain, mate, crew, and passengers of the Creole, showing that sufficient evidence could be procured from the United States, if time was allowed.

After an examination of the testimony offered, the Court replied that were the captain, crew, and passengers, as set forth in the affidavits, here present to testify in this case, they should not consider them as entitled to belief or credit, and should charge the jury to that effect; and that no evidence could be procured to convict the prisioners at the bar, for they were perfectly justified in the course pursued on board the Creole, and was about to be set free.

The Chief Justice then addressed the negroes something in this style:—It has pleased God to set you free from the bonds of slavery—may you hereafter live the lives of good and faithful subjects of her Majesty's Government. They were then set at liberty by proclamation.

Exhibition of the Pupils of the New York Institution for the Blind.—The exhibition of the pupils of this noble charity, held at the Tabernacle on Friday afternoon, was of a highly interesting character, and was witnessed by an immense audience. The children were ranged on seats on the rostrum, neatly dressed, and appearing healthy and happy. A piece of music was finely executed by an instrumental band, composed of the pupils, after which the pupils were examined in reading, geography, and grammar, in all of which they manifested great proficiency. The exercises in reading excited much interest—the pupils reading portions of Scripture from an embossed Bible, with great readiness and facility.—Several pieces of music were also executed upon the piano with great beauty and precision. A great variety of articles manufactured at the Institution—baskets, hats, bandboxes, &c., were exhibited, executed with much taste and neatness.

The exhibition, as a whole, was highly creditable to the managers and pupils, and we were gratified to see so much interest manifested in the Institution, as was shown by the vast concourse on the occasion.—N. Y. Express.

Mormonism in all ages, or the rise, progress and cause of Mormonism.—With the Biography of its Author and Founder, Joseph Smith, Jr.—A volume of 305 pages giving a detailed account of Mormonism from its origin till the present time. The absurdities of the system which meet us at every step, are fully exposed, and the profligate character of its founder made most manifest. The various publications of the Mormons are examined, and their inconsistency and silliness clearly exhibited.—The reader is compelled to ask, as he proceeds, how such a company of arrant fools have ever been collected together, as the multitude who have become the dupes of Joe Smith and his coadjutors. This question and others of similar character, the author endeavors to answer by explaining the various causes that have contributed to foster the lying inventions of the Mormon prophet.

We recommend the book to all who wish to acquire a complete acquaintance with this modern heresy.—Bap. Adv.

Infamous Outrage.—On Sunday afternoon, two men named Richard Campbell and Edward Emmons, or one of them, hurled two large stones through the glass door of the confectionary store, and ice cream and soda water establishment of Henry Luer, No. 49 Bowery, breaking the glass and sash, and endangering the life of a young lady, who was partaking of some ice cream, and near whose head one of the stones passed. The accused were arrested as acting in concert, although Campbell threw the stones—and Justice Stevens inflicted upon them the utmost penalty of the law, viz: fining each $25 and costs, which they refused to pay, and were committed to prison until they shall pay the fine.—Jour. Com.

Railroad Baggage.—The traveling public will be glad to learn that the different rail road companies from Albany, west to Rochester, have combined to effect a very desirable reform in the arrangement of baggage.

A crate is provided for each city and village upon the route, which is locked and remains unopened until it arrives at its destination, thus avoiding transhipment and risk of loss.

Plagues of a small Town.—A celebrated French writer says that the six plagues of a small town are—a lawyer with great knowledge, great sophistry, and no sense of justice; an eminent physician with little skill or manners; a preacher without any conscience; a quarrelsome soldier; a politician without principles; and a man of letters who eternally dogmatizes.

The referees in the case of Brewer vs. The Western Rail Road Company have awarded Mr. Brewer $5,650 as compensation for the injuries sustained by him in the collision of the cars on the Western Rail Road last fall, between Westfield and Chester.

Settlement of the Difficulty between Messrs. Stanley and Wise.—Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to say that the difficulty between Messrs. Wise and Stanley has been arranged by the kind offices of friends. The terms of the settlement have not been made public. Wise is in the House this morning, and wears a more cheerful aspect. Stanley will now return to Washington, and I hope both gentlemen will avoid forcing their difficulties upon the public again. They will not now resort to that bloody code which can meet an insult only by murder.—Corres. of Eve. Jour.

Williams College.—This institution, located in a distant secluded corner of Massachusetts, is little known, compared with its merits and usefulness. Its faculty is not exceeded by any in New England in point of talent and scholarship, nor is there a college in the Union where a more thorough moral and intellectual training is obtained. Repeated and pure revivals have visited it, and not a few of the leading christian philanthropists and missionaries of our country have gone from it to enlighten and redeem the world. PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers, to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. Every stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25, those wishing to vote by proxy, can do so, by forwarding their votes to some one of the stockholders; naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting also their number of shares.

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

This is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practisal school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

POETRY.

From Bentley's Miscellany for February.

Belshazzar's Feast.

The king sat in his regal pride,
Proud nobles thronged the festal board,
High foamed the wine, whose purple tide
Was from God's sacred vessel's poured

Music and minstrelsy were there,
Loud echoing to the vaulted roof;
And qeenly dames whose jewels rare
Blazed in the torch-light far aloof.

With revelry the palace rung;
Yet sudden 'midst the banquet's cheer
Alarm hath hushed each tuneful tongue,
And every eye glares wild with fear.

Why start ye proud in mute amaze?
Why quail ye mighty? shriek the fair?
Why on one spot in horror gaze,
With features marbled by despair?

What hand is that whose fingers mark
With awful characters the wall!
Whose hidden mysteries, stern and dark,
Can e'en Belshazzar's soul appal!

Stand forth Astrologers! and read
That scroll, with dreadful import fraught;
Wealth, fame, and power shall be his meed
By whom the interpretation's taught.

What! silent all? And is there none
That fearful secret to unfold—
'Lo!' cried the seer, 'the holy One
To me its mystery hath unrolled.

'Tremble proud King! thy reign is o'er,
Thy sceptre shall the Median sway,
Thy pomp and glory are no more,
Thy kingdom it hath passed away.

'Thou hast lifted up thy haughty brow
Against the Lord of earth and heaven;
That God, O King! hath weighed thee now,
And judgemnt is against thee given.

'Hark even now the voice of war
Is thundering against thy brazen gates;
I hear the battle shout from far—
Destruction, Monarch, on thee waits.'

The prophet ceased—That very night
Belshazzar's power and life were gone,
And ere the morning star was bright,
Darius reigned in Babylon.

MIGRATION OF BIRDS.

"The stork in heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."

The sense of these striking lines evidently is, that these birds know the seasons when to return to their former abodes; but the Jews did not think of returning to their former, and only true God. They also refer to that remarkable custom in the history of many birds—their migration.—Storks are birds of passage; and it is uncertain whence they come, or whither they go. Assembling on a particular day, they are said never to leave one of their company behind; and take their flight when they leave Europe in the night time. They return in March. In Holland especially they are favorite birds, and protected by law from injury or molestation. An intelligent friend, who has traveled through that country, informs me that these birds are thus carefully preserved, in consequence of their destroying a small insect which is most fatal by undermining their dykes.—The Egyptians, it is well known, adored the ancient Ibis, which it is supposed by some was the stork.

The crane is also a great wanderer, spending the autumn in Europe; then he visits some more southern climate, and returns again in the spring; crosses over to the north in summer, and comes back to the cultivated grounds once more by the autumn. In these journeys they fly to an astonishing height; and their note, which is uncommonly loud, is often heard in the clouds when the birds are not seen at all. The stork is silent; but the crane has a loud piercing voice, which governs his and the flight of others in their migration.

At the end of September, the European swallows direct their flight towards Congo, Senegal and the whole Morocco shore, performing their fatiguing journey in seven days. It is not asserted that all swallows migrate. Some probably are so formed as to be very differently affected by the approach of winter, and find safe retreats with a sufficiency of warmth, in caves and holes of the earth. Such are awakened from their torpor by the genial influence of spring; while a secrete instinct brings back those which in the previous autumn had undertaken the long voyages referred to. The swallow comes back to the nest constructed the previous summer; and the stork will seek again the very house which she forsook at the beginning of winter.

In the United States, the barn swallows (Hirundo Americana) are seen in great numbers, skimming along near the earth, and directing their course toward the south, during the month of September. They probably winter with other American migratory tribes about the Gulf of Mexico.—In the winter of 1840, I noticed almost daily amid the cultivated ground and woods of Florida, flocks of doves, robins, black birds, wild turkeys, the bluebird, and the redheaded woodpecker, all well known inhabitants of more northern latitudes. The bluebirds most likely winter in the West Indies, where they are more common at that season. What an extraordinary flight for so small a bird! He is known to fly a mile per minute; and at this rate, allowing time for rest, in less than half a day he would reach the Bermudas, 600 miles distant from the nearest part of our continent!

Few subjects of natural history have excited more curiosity than these annual migrations of the feathered tribes. It is generally believed that the cause of their retreat arises from fear, climate or hunger. Thus the starling, when he finds substance no longer in Sweden, yearly descends into Germany. And the quails forsake the burning heat of Africa for the milder sun of Europe. Here they pass the summer, and then direct their course back to the temperate air of Egypt. The whole a daring journey, yet easily accomplished.

In our own country as well asin Europe this migration usually commences about the end of September, when the birds flock to southern latitudes. It is interesting to notice the order of the flight. Those of the duck species generally range themselves in a long line; or sometimes makes their march angularly, uniting two lines in the centre, like the letter > reversed.—The leader at the point seems to cleave the air, and aid the passage of those behind; and when fatigued, he falls back into one of the files, while another takes his place. On Staten island, two weeks ago, I observed about sunset, high in the air, a flock of wild geese thus wending their way across New Jersey towards the south.

The Columbia Migratoria, the wild pigeon of our country, is one of the most extraordinary birds known. Wilson, the great American ornithologist, while descending the Ohio, saw a column of these migratory pigeons, passing from Kentuky over Indiana, eight or ten miles in length. Sometimes they swept the heavens in one vast extended line; and then again the pilots would vary their course, until with shining undulations, the body filled a space resembling the windings of some majestic river. Their journeys are known to extend as far as the Bahama Islands. With some species of the wild duck they travel at the rate of forty miles an hour. The structure of migratory birds is admirably calculated for rapid and long-continued flight. Their feathers being very light, they can float many hours in the atmosphere, requiring scarcely any support; and their bones, filled with air instead of marrow, are of a lighter substance than those of quadrupeds.

Two things are peculiarly striking in these migrations of the feathered race.

First. They know the precise time when they should go, and when to return. "The stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming."

We cannot suppose that they have any memory of the region they formerly visited; nor that they can see it while traveling at so great a height in the air. Doubtless they fly onward, as they continue to find the atmosphere suitable to their necessities and feelings; but it is nevrtheless in other respects a singular and inexplicable instinct.

Secondly. It is equally astonishing that these birds, without reason, can know the exact path they should take, and how far they should go! Without a guide or provisions, they will accomplish a journey of more than a thousand miles long, in the most regular order, and usually flying against the wind, and often by night! The humming bird, for instance, the most minute of the migratory tribe, late in September leaves our trumpet, and other tubular flowers, and by a rapidity of flight which almost eludes the eye, soon luxuriates again amid the ever green orange groves of Florida.

How can all this be explained, except in the wise provisions of a gracious Providence! "Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them." Being of beings! God of love! the provision which thou hast made for all thy creatures is adequate to his wants. How inexpressible and great are thy tender mercies! Especially art thou good to man. "Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings? and not one of them is forgotten before God. Fear not, therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows." G. P. D.

New York, Oct. 14, 1841.

A TEMPERANCE STORY,

One of the Washingtonians relates the following quizzical story about himself:

I used to drink, and my wife used to jaw me about it. What do you get drunk for? said she. What do you jaw me for? said I. So we agreed and made a firm bargain that I would not drink and she would not scold. For three long days we held on firm—no drinking nor scolding—but, on the third evening, being in company with some good fellows, I took a horn, and when that was down I right off wanted another, and in a short time I found myself about 'how fare you?' with twenty horns safe and snugly in my bread basket. (Tremendous laughter.) By and by it got to be time to go home; but, as you may well suppose, I dreaded to meet my wife like the toothache, (laughter.) However, go I must, and so I staggered along, hoping to find my wife abed, (laughter.) When I reached the house I found it still lighted, and through the window I saw my wife up and waiting for me, (laughter.) Thinks I, I can't go in yet, but I must wait till she goes to bed;—so there I stood half freezing in the cold rain for two hours, (tremendous laughter.) At last she went to bed and I crept in at the back door, stumbling over pails and chairs, but finally succeeded in getting to bed without disturbing her, (laughter;) but, after dozing awhile, I awoke and found myself as dry as a fish, (laughter.) You know, brethren, how dry we used to be in the night after a spree, (tremendous laughter.) My wife always knew what was the matter with me when I got up in the night to drink cold water, (laughter.) I had hardly dared to get up for fear of my wife; but my thirst was greater than I could bear, (laughter,) so out I crawled and groped very softly after the water-pail, (laughter,) but no water was there, (laughter;) I then felt round in the dark on the tables and shelves for something to cool my burning thirst; soon I found a tin pan full of something liquid; I seized and put it to my mouth and took a long and hearty draught—the liquid at the same time running out at each side of my mouth down my cheeks—(tremendous laughter;) I thought that the liquid tasted odd—and at that instant it flashed on my recollection that I had fixed some poison a few days before to kill rats with, (tremendous laughter for five minutes.) Horror struck I stood, my hair standing on end—it was death to scream out, for my wife would jaw me if she waked, (laughing and stamping;) and surely it would be death to hold still, but scream I must, and scream I did, (riotous laughter.) 'What was in that pan?' 'You are dry, are you?' said she. 'What was in that pan?' shouted I, still louder. 'What makes you dry?' screamed she. 'What was in that pan?' yelled I, in a perfect agony of fear. 'What pan?' 'Why, the pan on the shelf.' 'Oh, you brute, you have drunk up all my starch.' (Tremendous laughter for over five minutes, and cries of order from the chairman.) The next morning my shirt collar was pasted fast to my neck and cheeks, and it took half an hour to clear it off. (Here Mr. Brown sat down amid the cheers of the whole Society.)

FAMILIES OF LITERARY MEN.

The Quarterly Review, in discussing an objection to the Copyright Bill of Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, which was taken by Sir Edward Sugden, gives some very curious particulars about the progeny of literary men. "We are not," says the writer, "going to speculate about the causes of the fact—but a fact it is—that men, distinguished for extraordinary power of any sort, very rarely leave more than a brief line of progeny behind them. Men of genius have scarcely ever done so. Men of imaginative genius, we might say, almost never. With the one exception of the noble Surrey, we cannot, at this moment, point out a representative in the male line, even so far down as the generation of any English poet, and we believe the case is the same in France. The blood of beings of that order can seldom be traced far down even in the female line. With the exception of Surrey and Spencer, we are not aware of any great English author, of at all remote date, from whose body any living person claims to be descended.—There is no other real English poet prior to the middle of the eighteenth century, and we believe no great author of any sort—except Clarendon and Shaftesbury—of whose blood we have an inheritance amongst us. Chaucer's only son died childless. Shakspeare's line expired in his daughter's only daughter. None of the other dramatists of that age left any progeny—nor Raliegh, nor Bacon, nor Cowper, nor Butler. The grand daughter of Milton was the last of this blood. Newton, Locke, Pope, Swift, Arburthnot, Hume, Gibbon, Cowper, Grey, Walpole, Cavendish, and we might greatly extend the list—never married. Neither Bolingbroke, nor Addison, nor Warburton, nor Johnson, nor Burke, transmitted their blood. M. Renouard's last argument against a perpetuity in literary property, is, that it would be founding another noblesse. Neither jealous aristocracy, nor envious Jacobinism need be under much alarm. When a human race has produced its 'bright consummate flower' in this kind, it seems commonly to be near its end."

Poor Goldsmith might have been mentioned in the above list. The theory is illustrated in our own day. The two greatest names in science and literature of our time, were Davy, and Sir Walter Scott.—The first died childless, Sir Walter left four children, of whom three are dead, only one of them, (Mrs. Lockhart,) leaving issue, and the fourth (his eldest son,) though living, and long married, has no issue. These are curious facts.

Perils of St. Petersburgh.—It is melancholy to contemplate the constant danger in which this brilliant capital is placed. If Mr. Kohl's picture is not overcharged, the concurrence of a strong westerly wind and high water, just at the breaking up of the ice, would at any time suffice to occasion an inundation sufficient to drown the whole population, and convert the entire city, with all its sumptuous palaces, into a chaotic mass of ruins. The Gulf of Finland runs to a point as it approaches the month of the Neva, where the most violent gales are always those from the west, so that the mass of waters, on such occasions, is always forcibly impelled towards the city. The islands forming the delta of the Neva, on which St. Petersburgh stands, are extremely low and flat, and the highest point in the city is probably not more than 12 or 14 feet above the average level of the sea. A rise of fifteen feet is, therefore, enough to place all St. Petersburgh under water, and a rise of thirty feet is enough to drown almost every human being in the place. The poor inhabitants are, therefore, in constant danger of destruction, and can never be certain that the whole 500,000 of them may not, within the next twenty-four hours, be washed out of their houses like so many drowned rats. To say the truth, the subject ought hardly to be spoken of with levity, for the danger is too imminent, and the reflection often makes many hearts quake in St. Petersburgh. The only hope of this apparently doomed city is, that the three circumstances may never occur simultaneously, viz: high water, the breaking up of the ice, and a gale of wind from the west. There are so many points of the compass for the wind to choose among, that it would seem perverse in the extreme to select the west at so critical a moment; nevertheless, the wind does very often blow from the west during spring, and the ice floating in the Neva and the Gulf of Finland is of a bulk amply sufficient to oppose a formidable obstacle to the water in the upper part of the river. Had the ancient sages of Okhta kept meterological records, one might perhaps be able to calculate how often in a thousand years, or in ten thousand years, such a flood as we are here supposing might be likely to occur. As it is, the world need not be at all surprised to read in the newspapers one of these days that St. Petersburgh, after rising like a bright meteor from the swamps of Finland, has as suddenly been extinguished in them like a mere will-o-the-wisp. May heaven protect the city!—Foreign Quarterly Review.

OLD TOMB-STONES.

At the country seat of Mr. James N. Dickson, in Bristol township, near Crescentville, and about six miles from the city of Philadelphia. may be seen some interesting relicts of the olden time, which have also some connection with the early religious history of the colony of Pennsylvania.—These are three tomb-stones, nearly a century and a half old, in a pretty good state of preservation. They were found under a tree in an orchard, but are now placed in a more secure situation. As the inscriptions on them are curious, and posses a peculiar interest to those who are fond of tracing back the history of the state, I have carefully copied them, and present them to your readers. Where one of the stones is mutilated, I have supplied some letters from conjecture, which are enclosed in brackets.

The names of the deceased led me to suppose that they were Welsh. The errors in orthography, especially so gross a one as FOE for OF, seems to show that English could not have been the native language of the stone-cutter.

Can any of your readers inform us whether there existed at so early a date a society of Sabbatarians, or Seventh-Day Baptists, as they are now called? Elizabeth Price, probably the mother of John and Rees, must have been among the first emigrants to the province, as her death occurred fifteen years after Penn's first landing. In connection with this, I deposit at your office, for the inspection of the curious, a deed conveying to "Robert Turner, of the city of Dublin in the kingdom of Ireland merchant," 5000 acres of land "in the province of signory or Pennsylvania," for the consideration of £109 sterling "in hand paid," and a quit-rent of one shilling a year for every hundred acres. It is signed with William Penn's autograph.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, March 16, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE on hand and offer for sale, for cash or approved credit, the largest assortment ever offered in this place. Physicians are particularly invited to give their stock an examination before purchasing elsewhere, as they are determined to undersell any establishment in this section of the State

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

TO FARMER'S FAMILIES, AND TO ALL AFFECTED WITH DISEASE.

We have this day been appointed sole agents in this place for the sale of Doct. D. JAYNE'S Celebrated medicines consisting of JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT, JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM, TONIC VERMIFUGE and SANATIVE PILLS.

All articles sold by us are direct from Doct Jayne, and warranted pure. Printed circulars will accompany articles of his, attesting their worth and virtues, and will be given to any one who may wish to become acquainted with them.

We have the pleasure to inform those afflicted with diseases of the lungs, Consumption, Spitting of Blood, Coughs or Influenza, that we have also been appointed agent for the sale of Joshua Fish's celebrated and unrivalled LILLY SYRUP, which for the last year has affected more cures for the [illegible] used than any other medicine ever [illegible] public. Those upon the brink of the [illegible] been called to health by its powerful [illegible] weak have become strong, [illegible] man has been cured of his pale [illegible] look and racking cough. MAGNETIC ODONT[illegible]

THE TEETH! THE TEE[illegible]

The Incomparable Tooth Prepar[illegible]

THE fact is proved, and the most [illegible] and doubting are fully convinced of its great utility, as we have the evidence from the sale of 25,000 boxes of the Odontica, within the past year. It is ascertained from experience, that when used, the teeth will never decay, but remain till the latest age of man, with their natural wear; and more—in thousands of cases, nervous toothache, (that climax of pain) has at once been effectually cured by this most popular dentrifice in America. And in conclusion, where, or who is the young lady or gentleman, aye, the individual that values a beautiful set of teeth, sound gums, and a sweet breath more than fifty cents, that will be longer destitute of a box of Dr. M. Hitchcock's Magnetic Odontica.

WINSLOW'S BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond eproach.

ETERNITY.

"When I endeavor to represent eternity to myself," says Saurin, "I avail myself of whatever I can conceive most long and durable. I heap imagination on imagination, conjecture on conjecture. First, I consider those long lives which all men wish and some attain. I observe those old men who live four or five generations, and who alone make the history of an age. I do more; I turn to ancient chronicles, I go back to the patriarchal age, and consider life extending through a thousand years; and I say to myself, all this is not eternity, all this is only a point in comparison of eternity. Having represented to myself real objects, I form ideas of imaginary ones. I go from our age to the time of publishing the gospel, from thence to the publication af the law, from the law to the flood, from the flood to the creation; I join this epoch to the present time, and I imagine Adam yet living. Had Adam lived till now, and had he lived in misery, had he passed all his time in a fire, or on a rack, what idea must we form of his condition? At what price would we agree to expose ourselves to misery so great? What imperial glory would appear glorious were it followed by so much woe? Yet this is not eternity; all this is nothing in comparison of eternity! I go farther still, I proceed from imagination to imagination, from one supposition to another. I take the greatest number of years that can be imagined. I add ages to ages, millions of ages to millions of ages. I form of all these one fixed number, and I stay my imagination. After this I suppose God to create a world like this which we inhabit. I suppose him creating it, by forming one atom after another, and employing in the production of each atom the time fixed in my calculation just now mentioned! What numberless ages would the creation of such a world in such a manner require!—Then I suppose the Creator to arrange these atoms, and to pursue the same plan of arranging them as of creating them.—What numberless ages would such an arrangement require! Finally, I suppose him to dissolve and annihilate the whole, and observing the same method in this dissolution as he observed in the creation and disposition of the whole. What an immense duration would be consumed! Yet this is not eternity; all this is only a point comparison of eternity!"

It was a question asked of the brethren, both in the classical and provincial meetings of ministers, twice in a year, if they preached the duties of the times? And when it was found that Mr. Leighton did not, he was censured for this omission, but said, "If all the brethren have preached to the times, may not one poor brother be suffered to preach on eternity?"

A lady having spent the afternoon and evening at cards, and in gay company, when she came home, found her servant maid reading a pious book. She looked over her shoulders and said, "Poor melancholy soul, what pleasure canst thou find in poring so long over that book?" That night the lady could not sleep, but lay sighing and weeping very much. Her servant asked again and again, what was the matter? At length she burst out into a flood of tears, and said, "O! it was one word I saw in your book that troubles me: there I saw that word eternity. O how happy should I be if I were prepared for eternity!" The consequence of this impression was, that she laid aside her cards, forsook her gay company, and set herself seriously to prepare for another world.

A religious man, skilled in all literature, was so ardently bent to impress eternity on his mind, that he read over carefully seven times a treatise on eternity, and had done it oftener, had not speedier death summoned him into it.

Awful as the consideration of eternity is, it is a source of great consolation to the righteous. An eminent minister, after having been silent in company a considerable time, and being asked the reason, signified that the powers of his mind had been solemnly absorbed with the thought of everlasting happiness. "O, my friends," said he, with an energy that surprised all present, "consider what it is to be forever with the Lord—forever, forever, forever!"

TWO THINGS TO BE LAMENTED.

It is to be lamented—greatly lamented—that some churches and many church-members, set so little value to the gospel and its ministry. Often has our heart been pained to see the devoted, self-denying, and disinterested minister, spending his time, employing his talents, and exhausting his strength and property in the service of his brethren, while few or none sympathize with, or help him or his family, who are daily sinking into poverty and helplessness, as he descends to the grave. He has spent all in their service, dies, and leaves his widow and orphans in poverty and beggary, or doles out his old age in penury and want. And yet his brethren, while they extol his talents, and admire and love him for his piety and devotion, seem to be unconscious that they have robbed him of his wages, beggared his widow and orphans, and dishonored and insulted God by their parsimony and injustice. O! this is a dark spot upon our escutcheon—a blight upon the church; it is lamentable, and should be corrected.

Once more: it is to be lamented, that so many, especially young men in the ministry, should spend so many months of their precious time traversing the country in search of vacant churches, while sinners are perishing in every direction around them for lack of knowledge. To our mind, they must entertain wrong ideas of the true design, and character of the gospel ministry; or else they have greatly misjudged the better way to get into a successful and useful course of ministerial labor. The design of the ministry is, first to convey the good news of salvation to sinners; and when they are converted, to feed the sheep and lambs; but these want to begin their career by feeding the old sheep first. The first work of the gospel minister is to lay the foundation, & then build; but these prefer to build on foundations laid by others. The character of the gospel ministry should never be tarnished by the love of place, or a chief seat. It should ever be the object of the minister to hide himself behind his office, and never should he dishonor his office, and defile his ermine, by using it as a stepping-stone to ascend to places of honor and profit. We have intimated that this mode of traversing the country in search of vacancies, besides being wrong in itself, is not the best way to get into a useful field of labor; for, aside from the fact that it savors of egotism, or seems to say that the man thinks more of himself than others do, the preacher will soon be regarded as a place hunter, or a sort of religious loafer, caring more for the place than the flock. Moreover, it shows that the man is improvident, and does not provide for his own; and, whatever churches may think of Paul's other lectures, they are thoroughly indoctrinated into this, that he that does not provide for his own house has denied the faith; and that if a man cannot govern his own family, he should not have the church committed to his care.

The truth is, that churches are generally too calculating, to tax themselves with the support of a man who is determined to do nothing towards supporting himself. It is to be lamented, therefore, that brethren who might be useful, should spend so much time in hunting places to preach at; when, if they would go to work immediately, in the very way that Providence seems now to point out, they would be useful, and that usefulness would be seen; and instead of spending their time and little money in search of places, they would soon be sought for by the churches, as suitable pastors and bishops.

We most affectionately recommend this course to all our unoccupied brethren, as the most honorable, Christian and profitable mode of procedure.

RETROSPECTIONS FROM ETERNITY.

What is this transient life! It is stealing noiselessly, but most rapidly away!—How soon shall we all sleep in death! We now look forward to the dying scene, knowing that it must come. We shall feel that we are dying; we shall go through the scene, now shrouded in so much mystery. What, then, will the remembrance of earthly joys or woes avail to us?

How soon shall time sweep away in its wrecks every vestige of our earthly existence—crumbling these houses to the dust—burning up the earth on which we tread—and rolling away the blue firmament which canopies it. Ah! how soon shall we be looking back from the remote periods of eternity, through the long lapse of ages, to the few moments we passed in this rebellious world, in this infancy of our being. Oh! man, man—are you a thinking, rational, immortal being! And can you be regardless of such awful truths. Can you cling to this world, and chain your soul to earth, and clog it with all the vanities of time, when it struggles to be free from such trammels, and to soar to its native skies?

Oh! what will touch the heart of man. What will convince him that eternity is worth more than the fleeting moments of life?—that the redemption of the soul from endless sin and suffering demands a thought? Oh, God! send, send thy Spirit;—interpose in mercy, or he is lost forever!

Time rolls on! centuries glide away.—Ere long, we shall look back from our remote position in the eternal world, as the associates of Noah now look back to the scenes they witnessed while on earth.—Think of these spirits now in prison; think what must be their reflections in view of the fact, that they have bartered eternal joy for the sins of a moment on earth. Oh! how must remorse prey upon them as they at this moment lift up their voices in wo, exclaiming, "the harvest is passed, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."

And is it so? Have thousands of years already elapsed, while they still continue the victims of sin? So says unerring truth. They wearied out the long suffering of God, and grieved away his Spirit. And shall eternity still roll on while they remain in their abode of sorrow? Nothing can be more sure. Their own hand has planted thorns in the pillow upon which they will forever in vain seek repose.

And is this our danger? Are we exposed to so fearful a doom! "Verily," saith the Scripture to us, "unless ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Yes, very soon the graves, in which our bodies have mouldered to the dust, will disappear under the influence of time. Centuries will pass away, and not an individual shall know our names; not a vestige shall remain of our ever having existed. The world shall be busy; the hum of business and the notes of pleasure shall be heard.—The sun shall shine; the rain shall fall; the storm shall rage;—but we shall be far, far away;—the veteran souls of many centuries Oh! what is life, when we look forward to explore those regions where we must forever dwell? What are earth's joys, when we think of Heaven's undying glory? What are earth's trials, when we think of banishment eternal from the presence of God? But Heaven's gates are now open wide. Heaven's smiling fields now invite our steps. The angels' cordial welcome now bids us enter. The Father pleads; the Savior invites; the Spirit strives. Oh! let us all hear, and accept, and live.

RELIGIOUS BOOKS AND TRACTS.

The following is an extract from Mr. Kirk's speech at the recent anniversary of the Amer. Tract Society.

When we reflect upon what remains to be done, in conquering the world for Christ, it seems that the church sleeps where her every energy ought to be roused into action. The church is but half possessed of the spirit of the gospel. There are too many of the professed people of God in whom selfishness has never been destroyed. Too many are hoping for heaven who have not caught the first breathings of heaven; for that is full of God, and God is love: God could give his son. But these, O how little they give, how earnestly they make that little plead for the much that they keep! How few the hearts that beat in unison with that of Christ! Do you love the Saint's Rest? Have you been quickened by the unction of Flavel? Has intercourse with those noble spirits purified your mind, softened your heart, removed your difficulties, smoothed your spiritual pathway? They will do this for your fellow. They are as valuable to him as to you. And will you not give them to him? Have you thought that the Bible is sufficient for you? But you forget the fibres of the web of your Christian experience which have been woven by these. O, that we had the spirit and the love which we shall have to-morrow, if we die! These harpers that soon are to hymn the praises of God and the Lamb, O that they had a portion of that love now! O that those who, when they have tasted one drop of the love of the saints in glory, would fly to the remotest corner of the world to do the meanest errand of benevolence, had now something of that with which so shortly they shall glow and burn. We should hear no more of hard times, of commercial embarrassments, of failures of banks and of firms.

How God has honored the business in which this Society is engaged! It is preaching the word. His own mouth has spoken its praises. "How beautiful are the feet of them that bring glad tidings of great joy." It is more precious than gold. Tracts? who wrote them? Blessed men. We do not canonize them, but they have gone up to heaven, and have left behind them their mantle. Blessed men. They have walked with God, and wrote under the impulses of the love of Christ. God taught them. Some in prison. Baxter in sickness—keeping him on the verge of heaven, so that he might portray its bliss, and breathe forth its music. Blessed books! O give them wings, golden wings. The church, the country, the world needs their influence. The crisis-hour draws nigh. This land, I believe, is to be the theatre of the great contest with Antichrist. Let it come. Back it with Rome, with learning, with wealth, it can do no harm; it can work no evil issue.

RENUNCIATION OF UNIVERSALISM.

The instances of renunciation of the doctrine of universal salvation, seem to be greatly increasing in number. Another minister of the denomination holding to that sentiment, has been brought to see his errors, and has had the moral courage and independence to declare his convictions to the world. He wrote a letter, remarkable for the candor and kindness of its style, to the editors of the Western Luminary, (a Universalist paper,) desiring its publication in that paper. But they have shown their candor, in return, by refusing to publish it. It appers, in consequence, in the N. Y. Baptist Register, and will, we doubt not, deeply interest our readers. The following is a copy.—Christian Reflector.

MT. MORRIS, March 31, 1842.

Messrs. Editors of the Western Luminary:

BRETHREN—For some time past I have had strong convictions produced by reflection and prayerfully reading the word of God, that the system of Universalism is false, and founded in error. Those convictions I have endeavored to overcome. I have fought against them; I have prayed Almighty God to strengthen me in what I have formerly believed to be truth; I have thrown myself at the foot of the cross and sincerely asked God to direct me; I have cried to the Lord in the language of Paul, "What wilt thou have me to do?" I have kept these feelings a profound secret in my own bosom, until God has seen fit to convince me that I have embraced in my religious faith some important errors, which have neutralized in a great measure all my efforts to reclaim sinners. The greatest error which I have believed and preached, I conceive to be the doctrine that there will be none finally lost, (that is to say, eternally lost.) I feel it my duty, therefore, to say to the world through your publication, that I am no longer a Universalist. I cannot be willing to own that I am, without giving my conscience the lie, and ruining my own soul.

Brethren, I pray you in Christ's stead to ponder well your footsteps: stop one moment and reflect.

Behold the difference between our preaching (as a denomination,) and the preaching of the primitive disciples of our Redeemer. I know there are feeling hearts among you, sincere Christians, honest, worthy men. There are talents, which, if rightly directed, would advance the Redeemer's kingdom on earth. We have prayed together, we have tuned our voices in unison while singing the songs of redeeming grace. My prayer is, that God would give you the same convictions that I have experienced, and that you might be brought to the same result, and that our labors may be labors of love in the Lord, for the conversion of sinners, lest we lie down in sorrow and mourn when our hearts fail us, and our flesh wasteth away, Prov. v. 11, 12, and we be found naked, not having the righteousness of Christ.

My ministerial credentials I am ready to give up whenever a favorable opportunity presents.

I trust I shall ever be happy to have any of you call on me when you can make it convenient. Do not consider me your enemy for this step. I feel more true love for your welfare than ever I did before. I intend this for all my ministering brethren and friends, and say to you all in the sincerity of my heart, farewell.

M. L. WISNER.

THE JEWS.

The present physical, moral, and social condition of the Jews must be a miracle. We can come to no other conclusion. Had they continued from the commencement of the Christian era down to the present hour, in some national state as that in which we find the Chinese, walled off from the rest of the human family, and by their selfishness on a national scale, and their repulsion or alien elements, resisting every assault from without, in a shape of hostile invasion, and from an overpowering national pride, forbidding the introduction of new and foreign customs, we should not see so much of miracle interwoven with their existence. But this is not their state; far from it. They are neither a united and dependent nation, nor a parasitic province. They are peeled, and scattered into fragments; and like broken globules of quicksilver, instinct with cohesive power, ever claiming affinity, and ever ready to amalgamate. Geography, arms, genius, politics, and foreign help, do not explain their existence; time and climate, and customs equally fail to unravel it. None of these are or can be springs of their perpetuity. They have been spread over every part of the habitable globe; have lived under the reign of every dynasty; they have shared the protection of just laws, the oppression of cruel ones, and witnessed the rise and progress of both; they have used every tongue, and have lived in every latitude. The snows of Lapland have chilled, and the suns of Africa have scorched them. They have drank of the Tiber, the Thames, the Jordan, the Mississippi. In every country and in every degree of latitude and longitude, we find a Jew. It is not so with any other other race. Empires, the most illustrious, have fallen, and buried the men that constructed them, but the Jew has lived among the ruins, a living monument of indestructibility. Persecution has unsheathed the sword, and lighted the faggot; Papal superstition and Moslem barbarism have smote them with unsparing ferocity; penal rescripts and deep prejudice have visited on them the most unrighteous chastisement, and notwithstanding all, they survive. Like their own bush on Mount Horeb, Israel has continued in the flames unconsumed. They are the aristocracy of Scripture, reft of their cornets—princes in degradation. A Babylonian, a Theban, a Spartan, an Athenian, a Roman, are names known in history only; their shadows alone haunt in the world, and flicker on its tablets. A Jew walks every street, dwells in every capital, traverses every exchange, and relieves the monotony of the nations of the earth. The race has inherited the heir-loom of immortality, incapable of extinction or amalgamation. Like streamlets from a common head, and composed of waters of a peculiar nature, they have flowed along every stream, without blending with it, or receiving its color, or its flavor, and traversed the surface of the globe, amid the lapses of many centuries, peculiar, distinct, alone.—The Jewish race, at this day, is perhaps the most striking seal of the truth of the sacred Oracles. There is no possibility of accounting for their perpetual isolations, their depressed but distinct being, on any grounds save those revealed in the records of truth.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

BARTIMEUS.

Beneath a wide-spreading palm tree, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, there was seated a man who was blind—who from his birth had been dead to all the attributes of existence. There he sat, all motionless; the staff which guided him, and the hat which held the alms of the charitable, laying by his side. And as he sat there he could feel the warm breath of the summer zephyr upon his cheek—the rays of the great centre of light shed down upon him—the breeze at play with his locks, and cooling the sweat from his fevered brow. He could hear the sweet tones of music wafted from the woods and tree tops of the groves—he could hear the breathing melody of Nature's feathered songsters—but he could not see them. His ear was alive to every sound, but ah! the sight, which stamps hearing with reality, and adds to it a two-fold enjoyment, that was absent. And, save when the voice of friendly greeting met his ear, he seemed to himself to be the only creature of existence.

Presently the sound of approaching footsteps struck upon his ear, and as they came nigh he could distinguish among their jarring voices, one so soft and musical, that it almost seemed to inspire his soul. He turned his eyes toward it, but the balls were sightless, and that dreary void which had so long filled his mind, was there still. He sank back against the tree, which for many weary months had been the companion of his solitude, and his support whilst receiving the gifts of charity. But that voice again aroused him, and as he heard its silvery tones, he knew it was the voice of more than mortal man which spake before him. He had heard of heaven, he had heard of its being beyond the sky, which men told him was above his head; he had heard too, that within it there lived the God of earth, of whom Moses, the great father of his race, had spoken in time before; but above all, he had heard of that God's being then upon the earth, and nigh to his paternal home, and now when he heard the being before him speak, he thought if it could be Him. From his own countrymen he had heard of the miracles which this Holy One had performed—he had heard of his healing the sick, of restoring the blind, even such as he was now; he had heard how, with a single command, he had caused the dumb to speak, the deaf to hear, the lame to leap, and the dying to be whole; and could it be that that the same One was now near him? Yes, it was possible. He was nigh, and nigh to heal and save. Upon him the God of mercy turned his eyes, and with a touch, he says, "Be thou whole." The word has been spoken—the deed is done, the iron bands which had bound him to eternal darkness, are unlocked—the scales are loosened from his eye-lids—his sight is restored—the blind sees. And oh! what a glorious prospect meets his view. The whole of creation bursts upon his view at a single glance, as if done by magic. And it was magic that did it, the magic of divine mercy, than which there is none more powerful. He now sees Nature, and Nature's children. Her magnificent works, the works of her grateful servants, all lay before him. That which for years and years has only existed in the fancy, now is presented in the coloring of reality, and how unlike that he had held before in his mind. The heavens—their glorious architecture and their governor, the sun, who lights them up in rays of gold—they were there, and written upon them, as with the pen of prophecy, he sees, 'twas God who made them. He sees too, the mountains, those giants of earth, those nurslings of the sky, with their thousands of trees, painted with alternate hues of brown and green; the plains below them, its herbage, on whose velvet carpeting he had often trodden—they were all there. And before him stood the cause of all this turning of darkness into light, with a form

——————"So like his own,
Save where the beams of mercy shone."

With joy he surveys him, and then in gratitude exclaims, "Blessed be he who has made me thus a new creature."

CLOSE OF THE WEEK.—A week! It is but a short time indeed, but its events are a host, its changes many. To whom has the week just about to close brought joy?—to whom sorrow?—to whom riches?—to whom poverty?—to whom enemies?—to whom love?—to whom hatred?—to whom misery?—to whom happiness?—to whom sickness?—to whom health?—to whom life?—or, to whom DEATH? What! all these in one week? Yea, and a host more numerous than the sands of the sea.—Many who saw the dawning of the present week, will be in another world before it closes; many upon whom fortune smiled but a week ago, are now groaning beneath the withering frowns of poverty; many who were floating gently on the bark of life, o'er the unruffled sea of happiness, a week ago, are now the wrecks of ruin on the shores of affliction; many upon whom the sun of the last Sabbath shone propitiously, have, ere this time, met with some misfortune, and are turned upon the world, the children of poverty; and many whose expectations and hopes were beaming forth bright and prosperous at the dawn of the week, find themselves at the close the sad and miserable beings of cruel disappointment.

And such is the fate of man! It is subject to changes in a week, a day, nay, even an hour. The world is still in commotion, revolution succeeding revolution; time whirling in its rapid progress, leaving behind its trace of destruction. And even in a small community many thrilling and exciting circumstances might be summed up and recorded at the close of each week.

THE PRAYER MEETING.—The social prayer meeting is no place for coldness.—It is a sin to go there with a cold heart.—The revival must commence in the closet. If any one is cold, let him humble himself before God, and pray and fast if necessary, till his "heart burns within him." Then let him go to the prayer meeting, and unite his heart with those who are already revived, in pleading for the outpouring of God's Spirit. When a brother comes to a prayer meeting with a cold heart, & is called upon to pray, he does not lead the devotions of others. He has no errand but his own, to the throne of grace. He does not feel in unison with his brethren. He feels intensely on no point. He wanders over the world; embraces a multitude of objects, entirely foreign from the particular one for which special prayer is to be made; prolongs the exercises to a tedious length; introduces vain repetitions in reference to almost every object embraced in his petition, amplifying upon every idea, expressing it in several different forms of speech. Then, perhaps, he begins to feel a little warm, and returns and goes over the same ground the second time. In this way, he chills the feelings of others, and diverts their attention also from the special object for which they were assembled. A few brethren, who come to prayer meetings, with cold hearts, may thus become chilled to others, and a great hindrance to a revival.—Ch. Reflector.

THE BELIEVER'S VIEW OF DEATH.—To encounter death the faithful are prepared, both by their knowledge and experience. "They know in whom they have believed, and that he is able to keep that which they have committed unto him." They know that their Redeemer is the mighty God, and that part of the everlasting covenant between the Father and him, insures their victory over the grave; for it is written: "Thy dead men shall live; with my dead body shall they arise." "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." These wonderful things of God's law being certified to them by the Holy Ghost, become the object of their admiration, the foundation of lively hope, and their richest treasure. Hence death grows familiar to their minds, as a translation to enjoy spiritual life in perfection, in the presence of their beloved, the sweetness of which they have imperfectly known already. Answers to their prayers, and a change of state in passing from darkness to light, from death to life, in their conversion, alters the visage of death, and its nature too. Instead of seizing upon them, to root them out of the earth, and pluck them out of their dwelling, it comes to exalt them to glory, and honor, and immortality.—Rev. H. Venn.

NATURE'S VOICE.—There is religion in every thing around us—a calm and holy religion in the unbreathing things of nature, which man would do well to imitate. It is a meek and blessed influence, stealing in as it were, unawares upon the heart. It comes quietly and without excitement. It has no terror, no gloom in its approaches. It does not rouse up the passions; it is untrammeled by the creeds, and unshadowed by the superstitions of man. It is fresh from the hands of its author, and glowing from the immediate presence of the Great Spirit which pervades and quickens it.

It is written on the arched sky. It looks out from every star. It is among the hills and valleys of the earth—where the shrubless mountain-top pierces the thin atmosphere of eternal winter—or where the mighty forest fluctuates before the strong wind, with its dark waves of green foliage. It is spread out like a legible language upon the broad face of the unsleeping ocean. It is the poetry of nature. It is this which uplifts the spirit within us, until it is strong enough to overlook the shadows of our place of probation;—which breaks, link after link, the chain that binds us to materiality; and which opens to our imagination a world of spiritual beauty and holiness.

THE MERE PHILOSOPHER'S HEAVEN.—Glorious empire! what can animate us, if a prospect such as this move us not to the "laying aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us!" Nevertheless let us see to it that we do not conclude ourselves on the high road to the celestial city, just because we have some tastes and feelings to which we expect to find there the counterpart objects. We must warn you against mistaking an intellectual for a spiritual longing, the wish to enter heaven, because there "we shall know even as we are known," for the wish to enter it because God himself will be there "all in all." I am sure that many a man, in whose heart is no love of the Creator and Redeemer, might pant for a state in which he shall no longer see darkly through a glass, but have full sway over universal truth. The mind may struggle for emancipation, and crave a broader field, whilst the soul is the bondslave of Satan, and has no wish to throw away her chain. Aye, it is just as easy to dress up an intellectual paradise as a carnal, and to desire the one, as well as the other, without acquiring any meetness, "for the inheritance of the saints in light." The heaven of the Mohammedan is full of all that can gratify the senses, and pamper the appetites. The heaven of the philosopher may be a scene in which mind is to reach all its vigor, and science all its majesty. But neither is the heaven of the Christian.—The heaven for which the Christian longs, is the place in which God himself shall be his "strength and portion forever."—Melville.

RENUNCIATION OF UNIVERSALISM.—We learn from the Christian Soldier that a number of Universalists at Attleborough, Mass., have lately renounced Universalism. The good work is advancing, and truth is gaining ground.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruytor, June 9, 1842.

Value of Religion.

Men place a true or false estimate on religion as they are possessed or destitute of it. The carnal mind understandeth not the things of the Spirit, and therefore is not prepared to judge of its intrinsic excellence. The christian system is so entirely different from any thing that comes under the range of the sinner's thoughts that he is not prepared to speak of it only as he sees it exhibited in the lives of its professors; and here, if he judge from appearances, he is more likely to judge wrong than right, because, while the christian is tabernacled in the flesh, he is more or less, as his natural temperament excites, under the influence of his unsanctified nature; and he finds, as the Apostle to the Romans, that when he would do good evil is present with him, and that there is a law in his members warring against the laws of his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin and death. Thus the christian's external conduct is not an absolute index of his heart, because every child of God that falls into sin by unholy influences, is ready to cry out, O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?—He allows not that which he does, and mourns that he is not free from those influences that bring him into bondage. Thus it is that the value of the christian religion cannot be determined from the external conduct of its professors. Therefore, the man of this world has no means by which he may judge accurately of its value, save the representations made of it by God's word, and his children.

The christian is prepared to judge correctly of its absolute and relative excellence, for he has himself known what is the value of the sinner's pleasures, and now he knows the pleasures that flow from union with God. His decision is true, for he knows of what he speaks. When he speaks of the absolute value of religion, he says, what the scriptures declare of it, that it is all that heart could wish or enjoy, that it is a balm for every wound; that it is suited to all circumstances and places, and makes its possessor infinitely rich, honorable and happy, and provides an ample antidote for all the ills of life, a comfort in affliction—strength in weakness, wisdom in folly—help in adversity—a never-failing friend through life. It gives peace and hope in death, and endless life and bliss in heaven, where it shall unfold its ever-increasing glories to the enraptured vision of the saints that surround the throne of God.

When he speaks of its relative value he adopts the Apostle's sentiments and glories in nothing save the cross of Christ, and counts all things else dross; and with the Psalmist he says, I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of the Lord than to dwell in the tents of wickedness, and one day in the courts of God is better than a thousand elsewhere. And when he feels the divine influence in his heart, he despises the brightest scenes of sinful pleasures as too base, too grovelling for an immortal mind. The joys of religion are pure and rational—the joys of sense are carnal.—The joys of religion are as abiding as the throne of God. The joys of sense are as unstable as the restless ocean, and fickle as the varying winds, and in their change leave an aching void or a real sting. Well may the christian say, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. Thus religion is proved to be a priceless treasure. All the cavillings of sceptics, and all the efforts of ungodly men to depreciate its value and cast a shade over its effulgent glory are vain efforts. It stands in its own glory as the light of the world, giving life, peace, and joy with every good thing.

Some idea of the value of religion may be gained from the language of the Lord Jesus Christ, when he inquired, 'What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall he give in exchange for his soul?' By this form of expression he clearly shows that all the concentrated good of every kind and nature of this world is lighter than nothing and vanity, when compared with that religion that saves the soul from death, and gives it life, and peace, and heaven.

If religion is thus valuable, he is unwise who does not possess himself of it. He grasps at a shadow while he forsakes the substance; he seeks a fancied while he neglects a real good.

Moral Excellence.

Every true Christian has one object in connection with his other duties for which he is bound both from regard to his own peace and his profession as a Christian, to labor. This is to labor for the greatest possible moral excellence. Jesus Christ who is his pattern, exhibited the perfection of moral excellence in his whole character. The Christian should pursue this object from regard to his own peace, for there is no peace worthy of the name to those who are entirely destitute of this characteristic. As one advances in moral excellence, he advances towards christian perfection, and, consequently, towards perfection in happiness. The gospel of Jesus Christ is emphatically a gospel of peace, its primary object being to give peace, and this gospel is the standard of moral excellence. As a man is obedient to the gospel will his peace abound, as he is disobedient will peace depart from him.—Every man's peace is identified with obedience to the will of God, and obedience is the proof of moral excellence, and the sure harbinger of that peace that passeth understanding, verifying the language of the Psalmist, "Great peace have they which love thy law, and nothing shall offend them."

The Christian should pursue this object from regard to his profession as a christian. Having renounced the world and put on Christ, he becomes a witness to testify of the religion he professes. He is not prepared to give his testimony fully, till he understands the nature of the religion he professes, and knows something of its glorious perfections. When he has arrived to a state of perfect obedience, he is then prepared to exhibit the divine excellence of the Gospel. And as a witness for God, he testifies that the religion of Jesus Christ is the standard of moral excellence, and from this flows the perfection of peace. This is an important part of the Christian's labor. He is not to live for himself, but he is called of God to labor in his vineyard, and persuade men to be reconciled to his government. This he can never do more effectually than exhibiting in his own character those divine characteristics of the gospel. This consistency of conduct with profession never fails of carrying conviction to candid minds. Moral excellence, whenever found, will command the admiration and win the heart of every sensible person. Thus it is, by laboring for this object an individual's peace is promoted, and converts are made to the religion that saves the soul.

Vitiated Public Sentiment.

There cannot be found a more glaring inconsistency than public sentiment with regard to trespass on property and the social affections. Public sentiment governs statute laws, and presents the same inconsistency in the supreme law of the land:—Thus, if the robber steals a few dollars, public sentiment and statute law incarcerates him in the penitentiary. If the heartless libertine enters the domestic circle, and, by his fiendish arts betrays the innocent and fixes an indelible stain upon the character at the same time that he destroys the domestic happiness of an individual or whole families, and leaves the social affections bleeding and destroyed public sentiment and statute law bids him hold up his head in society, and bear the appellation of a gentleman, and perhaps a christian! Thus the social affections are made of less value than money, and the dearest relations in life are made the sport of the vile seducer. How keenly those who sport at other's disgrace would feel if the destroyer were to touch them in their social relations as they do others?—But, alas! public sentiment and law permits the ruined, the heart-broken, the disconsolate to mourn in secret, or seek the grave to shut them out from a world of sin and shame.

With the law of God it is otherwise.—It denounces its most fearful curse upon the violator of the affections and purity, and God will not suffer this law to be violated with impunity. It is time that the virtuous speak forth their indignation at such baseness, and learn to regard men according to their moral worth and virtue, and not esteem them as they abound in dollars and cents.—Life has no charms where reputation and virtue are gone. Society has no attractions if the licentious are in it.

Missionary Society.

We publish to-day an article from our correspondent "E. M.," touching our Missionary operations. Whether he has hit upon the best mode, we do not say. All we ask is, that by some means our missionary operations may become efficient. For some years we have been crippled, and what has been done, has been with halting and staggering. There is missionary zeal sufficient if it could be concentrated to meet in a good measure the demands made upon us. All that is wanting is to bring the zeal and means to bear most effectually. We trust the wisdom of the denomination will soon arrange this matter so that we may occupy the field that is opened before us.

Erratum.—We last week made one correction in Eld. Chadwick's "Strictures," and upon a more careful perusal we discover the following:

At the commencement of the second paragraph from the close of the article, the word amendment should be substituted for "commandment."

Missionary Operations.

Brother Bailey—Sir,—Pardon me for attempting to present to you a few thoughts on the subject of our Missionary operations. The present distracted state of our Missionary Society calls loudly for a thorough revision. While the Macedonian cry is heard from almost every quarter, we are doing comparatively nothing. Although we have a large amount of standing fund, we are continually laboring under embarrassments for want of funds to sustain missionary operations. There is a large portion of our standing fund loaned out without the requisite securities, and now and then a portion of it is lost—and even the interest is not promptly paid annually. Many of our local agents either forget, or neglect to report annually to the Society at its meetings, and they let arrearages run for years, without collecting or reporting the state of them to the society. Under such circumstances it is impossible to understand the true state and situation of the Society.—Now, Sir, I think this state of things, to say the least of it, is very unpleasant and unprofitable, and that it has existed long enough. I have long looked for something on this subject, but have looked in vain. I will therefore present a few considerations:

1. I would recommend that we divide our A. S. D. B. M. Society into as many Societies as there are Associations, and that the business of the Missionary Societies be transacted at the annual meetings of the several Associations.

2. That we make the standing fund available by putting it into a sinking fund, and expending it in five years. Let each Society transact its own business, and support its own missionaries.

3. Let there be one local agent in each church, who will be prompt and active in collecting funds of subscribers, and make a full report at each annual meeting of the Society.

4. Let any person become a member by paying, at least twenty-five cents, annually into the funds of the Society before the meeting of the Association. Under such an organization I think we can do far more for the spread of Gospel truth than we have done for many years past, under the present deranged state of our missionary operations. Under the proposed plan, we should have funds, and the business would be transacted, and missionaries supported, while on the other system of operations, the business is neglected, our missionaries are not supported, because we have not the requisite funds for their support.

Congressional News.

From the New-York Evangelist.

Washington, May 30, 1842.

The Apportionment Bill—Popular Power.

The apportionment bill has not yet passed the Senate. After a long debate, they this afternoon decided in favor of a ratio of over 70,000, which gives about 213 members. The House will not listen to this for a moment; nor to their ill-advised attempt to procure a representation of the fractional numbers. Indeed, on all matters relating to their own organization, the House ought, it seems to me, to have the prevailing voice. I am too democratic to regret the practical increase of the popular power in the House, that we daily witness. That power, ere many years, will be wielded for the highest purposes of freedom and good government. Increasing years and observation make me more conservative, it is true. But is a conservatism of rights, not of customs; of individual and popular power, not of social or class privileges.—In any government but a sacerdotal one, the nearer we approach to popular sovereignty, the more security of rights, the greater stability in institutions we may secure.

I know of little in the Senate debates on this bill, except the avowal of Berrien, that the attempt to get fractions represented arose from the fact that all the fractions over 50 per cent., except one, that fell to the South, happened to belong to the great cotton States. Alas, cotton is not at this moment the controlling power of our country. Those "hellish abolitionists," as the courteous official government paper terms them, have very nearly destroyed the power of cotton-wool to blind men's eyes.

Now I think of it, I wish to call the attention of your readers to the game contemplated with respect to Florida. That Territory does not contain people enough to make a State, under the lowest rate.—But the Floridians intended to form a Constitution, organize a State government under it, elect Senators and a Representative to Congress, and then demand admission to the Union as a matter of right, under the treaty by which we acquired Florida.

The President, no doubt, feared the effect of the example on the slaves, and hence the silly effort to treat the controversy as an "abolition" plot.

In regard to the tariff, there is little reason to believe that one with a very high rate of duties will succeed. The President swore, to a gentleman of my acquaintance, that he would Veto any Tariff Bill, that, like Mr. Salstontall's, proposed to allow the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands to continue!

I am sorry to say that the President is a profane swearer, and often interlards his conversation with oaths. Such an example in the Chief Magistrate of the nation merits a severe rebuke.

News of the Day.

CONGRESSIONAL BURYING GROUND.

An interesting article entitled "Meditations among Tombs," in the last Southern Literary Messenger, contains the subjoined statements respecting the honored dead interred in the Congressional ground.

One President, Wm. Henry Harrison, was for a time buried there, and two Vice Presidents, George Clinton of New York, and Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, still lie beneath the monuments erected by Congress to their memory. The U. S. Senators buried there are:

James Burrill, of Rhode Island,	died 1820
Macon Smyth, Connecticut,	" 1835
Thaddeus Betts, "	" 1840
Wm. Pinkney, Maryland,	" 1822
John Gillard, South Carolina,	" 1826
James Jackson, Georgia,	" 1806
Wm. A Trimble, Ohio,	" 1821
James Noble, Indiana,	" 1831
Elias K. Kane, Illinois,	" 1833

Of the Representatives interred in that cemetery, two are from Maine, viz: Jonathan Cilley and Timothy J. Carters; two from Vermont, Jonathan Hunt and Benjamin S. Deming; two from Massachusetts, Jacob Crowningshield and Elijah Brigham; one from Rhode Island, Nathaniel Hazard; Connecticut one, Zahman Williams; New York two, James Lent, Anson Brown; three from New Jersey, John Linn, Hedge Thompson, George Holcombe; four from Pennsylvania, John Smilie, Thomas Hartley, Henry Wilson, Patrick Farreley; four from Maryland, Daniel Heister, George E. Mitchell, Littleton Dennis, Isaac McKim; nine from Virginia, Theodorick Bland, John Dawson, Peterson Goodwin, Wm. A. Burwell, Wm. M. Ball, Alexander Smyth, C. C. Johnson, Philip Doddridge, Thomas T. Bouldin; five from North Carolina, James Gillespie, Richard Standford, George Mumford, Jesse Slocum, Gabriel Holmes; five from South Carolina, Thomas B. Singleton, Levi Casey, James Blair, Warren R. Davis, Richard J. Manning; two from Georgia, J. Jones, John Coffee; two from Kentucky, David Walker, Robert P. Henry; three from Mississippi, Nalsworthy Hunter, Christopher Rankin, David Dickson; one from Illinois, Charles Slade; one from Indiana, George L. Howard; one from Alabama, Jacob Lawler; one from Ohio, Jeremiah McLean.

These we believe are all who are interred in this beautiful cemetery. How much more eloquent are those silent halls of the dead, than the noisy halls of the living!

Mr. Petrich Assassinated.—This talented sculptor's studio was entered last evening, at about 10 o'clock, by two men with blackened faces, who attacked Mr. Petrich with knives, inflicting upon him three dangerous wounds; two of which were near the region of the heart. His calls for assistance were available for his rescue, the assassins retreating, leaving him bathed in his own blood, while relief came in, attracted by his cries.

He lies in a most critical state. Neither from him, nor from any other source, can the most ingenious speculation devise even a remotely possible cause for an act at once so dastardly and nefarious.

Mr. Petrich has been in the employment of the Government, in his capacity as sculptor, for many years. He has been engaged on the Treasury, Patent Office and Post-Office structures, in designing and executing the ornamental parts thereof. His last work was the design of four bas-relief panels for the base of Greenough's statue of Washington.

The Board of Foreign Missions held a meeting at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on Friday. Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen presided. The meeting was addressed, among others, by Rev. Mar Yohannan, Bishop of the Nestorian church in Syria. He said:—

"I have visited your Congress. I have seen your President. He has no crown on his head, no sword by his side, no soldiers at his door. He had no throne. He sat in his chair like a man. He shook hands with me. The President is but a man. In my country we must bow down to the floor before the King. It is the Bible makes this difference. In our country we have the Koran. You are happy because you have the Bible."

He sat down amidst much applause.

Examination.—'John wher's your passin' lesson?' 'That sentence on the black board, "There go a gentleman and a scholar."' 'Pass there.' 'There are a houn of multitude, fust person sing'lar, nomertive case to go.' 'Very well "go," the next.' So Tom makes for the door. 'Come back—pass go.' 'I was trying to go past.'—'Next.' 'Go is an insensible rig'lar verb, finity mood, perfect tense, 1st person go it, 2d person go ahead, 3d person no go: made in the 3d person to agree with the Whig party understood.' 'Very well next pass gentlemen.' Gentlemen is an abstract noun, subjunctive mood, neuter gender, but in opposition to scholar.' 'Right; scholar, the next.' 'Scholar is an obstinate pronomial adjective, ridiculous mood, imperfect tense, fust person, because I am speaking and governed by a.' 'Give the rule.' 'Scholars are governed by indefinite articles.' 'Very good; take your seats with 9 merit marks apiece.'

Great Fire!—Wesleyan Seminary Burnt.—The well-known Methodist Seminary at Lima, in Livingston county, 20 miles southward of Rochester, was chiefly destroyed by fire this morning before daylight. The fire was discovered about 3 o'clock, this morning, issuing from the cupola. The whole roof of the main building fell in—but the east wing was chiefly saved, and the west one would probably be saved also.

How the fire originated is not known, though the building has several times caught fire since it was built.

About 400 students were attending the Seminary which is in high repute.

No doubt immediate measures will be taken to repair the edifice, so as to prevent any serious impediment to the course of instruction.—Rochester Post of Thursday.

We understand the loss is estimated at $20,000.—Albany Daily Adv.

Afflicting Dispensation.—Mr. Samuel Mason, an old and highly respectable resident of the town of Farmington, whilst engaged in milking his cows on Friday afternoon, was prostrated to the ground by a paralytic stroke, in which situation he was discovered by a hired man, milking near him, and by whom he was taken to his house in a state of insensibility. Mrs. Mason, his wife, who was apparently in the enjoyment of good health, was much affected by the occurrence, and soon after he was brought into the house, she was discovered in the last agonies of death, having been attacked, as is supposed, with a fit of apoplexy, of which she died in a few minutes. Mr. Mason has remained utterly insensible ever since his attack, and is not expected to recover.—Canandaigua Repository.

Another Mystery.—The Norwich Daily Courier of the 24th ult. states that a pocket book was found in the suburbs of that city last week, secreted in a stone wall, and it is apprehended that something worse than robbery may be connected with it.—The pocket book has the name of "E. Bond, Macon, Georgia," written on one of the inner folds, and most of the papers go to show that Elijah Bond was its owner.—In it were found a U. S. gold piece, and a number of papers, none bearing any later date than May 28, 1840. Two of these papers were bills of goods bought by Messrs. Bond & Murdock (who appear from another paper to have been merchants in Crawford Co., Geo.) of Boorman, Johnson & Co., and J. & J. F. Trippe, of this city.—Some of the papers are important.

Royal Visiter Expected.—Extract from a letter of an officer to his brother in Cleaveland, dated on board United States ship Vincennes, of the United States Exploring Expedition:—"We have on board, Vindoba, the King of the Fejee Islands, as prisoner, who killed and eat eleven of the crew of a Salem vessel, in 1835. I suppose he will be shown about like Black Hawk, and then be sent home. He says I am his best friend, and wishes to live with me when we reach the United States. How would you like to have him for a messmate? He is a very fine looking fellow, very tall, and wears his hair half a yard long. He would be worth $5,000 to show about the country."—New Bedford Mercury.

A New Idea.—The London Morning Chronicle says, that amongst the marvels of the times, a patent has been actually taken out for paving the streets of London with India Rubber, and many scientific persons are sanguine as to its success. There is to be a substratum of wood, on which is to be put a facing of caoutchouc, mixed with iron filings and saw-dust, to a depth of several inches. This, it is calculated, will resist the ill influence of all weathers, and make the most delightful and durable pavement.

A Dreadful Affair.—A school mistress in Lynn, named Beckwith, we learn from a gentleman belonging to that town, tied a son of Mr. Meads up by the heels on Saturday, and whipped him, striking him several times on the head. When the school was out, the lad, who was about eight years old, went home and told his parents that he had been punished, and that his head ached; but there being nothing in his appearance to excite alarm, little notice was taken of what he said, and he went to bed; upon going into his room on Sunday morning, he was found lifeless upon his pillow.—Boston Post.

Medford, May 21, 1842.—Shocking Affair.—Our usually quiet town was on Thursday thrown into a great excitement by one of the most horrible, yet singular transactions which we have ever known.—It appears that a young man was fishing, early in the morning, in the canal, when he discovered an infant lying in the water. He immediately informed the town authorities, who took it out and conveyed it to a neighboring shed, until they could summon the coroner, &c. In the mean time the news had spread through the town, and reached the ears of Mrs. T., who resides near the canal bank. She immediately expressed a wish to go and see it, and asked a young woman in her employ if she would like to accompany her. She declined, and said she would stay at home and take care of Mrs. T.'s little boy. Mrs. T. then went out to see the child, and the moment she was gone, this girl, (who it appears was the mother.) went out of the back door and threw herself from an adjoining wharf into the dock. She was seen walking on the capstan of the wharf by a Mr. James, who kept his eye on her, and the moment he saw her overboard he plunged in and brought her safe on shore; yet so determined was she on self-destruction, that she caught hold of a stick of timber on the bottom of the dock, and it was some time before she could be made to loose her hold. It appears that the girl, up to the time of this transaction, had always borne a good character, and last Sunday night was admitted a member of a church in this town; and so well had she concealed her case, that no one, not even the women of the house suspected the truth. She laid in bed on Tuesday morning and complained of sickness, and, as she states, gave birth, unassisted, between five and six o'clock that morning, to the infant, which strangled and secreted. She rose after dinner and went about her usual work, doing the ironing, &c., for the family, and as far as the evidence of the woman of the house goes, they never suspected any thing up to the morning the child was found, but it appears almost impossible.

After she was taken out of the water she remained insensible for several hours, when she revived and related the above, and stated that she made up her mind to this dreadful alternative, rather than bear the disgrace she must bring upon herself by exposing her situation.—Boston Post.

A New Article of Export to the East.—The teetotalers have almost spoiled the whiskey trade at the west, and pork is so low, that feeding out corn to swine, won't pay. A new mode has been resorted to, in order to get rid of our immense surplus of corn, which can be had at a shilling a bushel, in Berrien county. Our farmers have commenced drying it, and converting it to Indian meal, which is now found to pay very well, by shipping it to the east.—Detroit Daily Advertiser.

A Brother.—The Rochester Democrat relates a story of a young man who had just returned to his home in the western part of New York, from a jaunt to the city, where he had been visiting his brother for the purpose of surrendering to him all his capital to enable him to meet his engagements. It seems that the brother in New York had failed, and was about to avail himself of the benefit of the bankrupt act. If he did so, a widow, from whom he had loaned five thousand dollars, would be beggared. This fact troubled him, and he communicated his troubles to his younger brother, who forthwith sold his estate, to the last acre, and placed the proceeds in the hands of his brother in New York, by which means he was enabled to pay off his more pressing debts, and to continue a moderate business.

A massive gold medal has been presented by the King of the French to Dr. John Thompson of Albany, in acknowledgment of the reception of a medical work which he had sent him.

Destructive Earthquake.—Ten Thousand Lives Lost.—We learn by the brig William Nelson, arrived last night, that a severe shock of an earthquake was felt at Port au Prince on the 7th; no damage done.—News had reached there from Cape Haytian that the town was entirely destroyed, with two-thirds of its inhabitants. The place contained about fifteen thousand. A courier arrived a few hours before the William Nelson left, stating that nearly all that was left was destroyed by the blowing up of the powder magazine. It was supposed that all the houses on the north side are destroyed.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

Wild Pigeons.—New Speculation.—3000 Live Wild Pigeons will arrive at five o'clock this afternoon, at the Depot of the Western Railroad, by the freight train from Albany. These pigeons were taken in Michigan a few days since, and are in fine condition.—Bos. Trans.

Boundary Commissioners.—The Commissioners appointed by the States of Maine and Massachusetts to proceed to Washington with a view to the adjustment of the North Eastern Boundary question, are as follows.

On the part of Maine—Edward Kavanah, Edward Kent, Wm. P. Preble, John Otis.

On the part of Massachusetts—Abbott Lawrence, John Mills, Charles Allen.—They are all vested with full powers.

All the hands engaged at the Navy Yard, Brooklyn, were discharged last week, in pursuance to instructions received from Washington.

There were four new frigates of 44 guns, to be launched on the same day, the 18th ult., the Cumberland at Boston, the Savannah at New York, the Raritan at Philadelphia, and the St. Lawrence at Norfolk. Orders were received at the Navy department to delay the launching, but they arrived too late for the first two, but kept back the others. The orders were made in consequence of the small appropriations made by Congress.

A young man, named Hilided, was shot through the head by another named Gox, at the late training in Clarion county, Pa.—Fox was fencing with a rifle which he picked up, not knowing the gun was loaded, when it went off, the ball passing through the unfortunate man's head.

The report which has been in circulation that a scholar in one of the schools in Lynn was tied up by his heels and whipped by the instructress of the school, and was found dead in his bed the next morning, is contradicted. The chairman of the school committee of that town, says "there is not one word of truth in the report."

The American Hotel at Lockport, a fine house, the Mansion House, on Seneca street, and the Franklin House on Water street Geneva, and the excellent National Hotel at Utica, have recently become Temperance houses.

Edward A. Smith, Esq., of Long Island, has raised on his farm the largest ox ever seen in the United States. The animal is almost white—merely a few colored spots on his body. He is 6 feet 3 inches high, 13 feet 4 inches in length, 9 feet 11 inches smallest girt, and weighs over 4000 pounds; and, what is more surprising, he is not six years old.

Six hundred and nine confirmations took place in the Episcopal churches of Philadelphia city and county, during the recent visit of the Bishop of the Diocese.

The Nauvoo Legion, it is said, comprises two thousand well disciplined and fully armed soldiers. Gov. Carlin was to review them on the 7th of May. "Joe Smith commands this formidable body.

The Madisonian asserts that the United States Government has merely made a demand on the English Government for compensation for the slaves of the Creole set free by the authorities of Nassau, without asking for the delivery of the mutineers.

The New Bedford Mercury says—"We learn by a gentleman from Wrentham, that the almost incredible number of three hundred and twenty thousand herring were taken from the Agawam river, at that place, on Saturday afternoon, the 23d ult. These fish ascend the stream at this season of the year in immense shoals, and are easily taken by the fishermen with what are called "scoop nets."

Iron War Steamer.—A vessel of this class is about to be built at Pittsburg, Pa., at the estimated cost of about $150,000.

The Richmond Compiler says that a relative of young Semmes has paid into the court at Charlottesville $25,000, the amount of bail forfeited for his non-appearance to answer to the charge of having murdered Professor Davis.

The Bunker Hill Monument has grown eight layers of stone this season, and presents an imposing appearance, being upwards of 180 feet in height.

A company of artillery in Salem, Mass., loaned forty muskets to the Rhode Island insurgents; and, upon demanding their delivery, only about one half of them can be found; a just retribution for interference in our affairs.

A young lady named Elizabeth Gordon of Port Jarvis, Orange co., committed suicide a few days since by taking laudanum. Disappointed affections, it is said, led her to do it.

Rev. Samuel J. May was almost mobbed at Bulfinch street church, Boston, because he introduced the subject of abolitionism and slavery in his sermon. About half the congregation withdrew.

A horse which had been bitten by a mad dog six weeks previously, at St. Louis, on the 16th ult., showed violent symptoms of hydrophobia; he ran after a man in the streets with his mouth extended, foaming and apparently in violent agony; pitched against a fence and fell, when, after biting himself furiously, he died.

Eggs from the Buckeyes.—A Buckeye Yankee a few days ago, shipped 70 bbls. of eggs from Cleveland to Boston! Each barrel contained 70 dozen. The Cleaveland Herald says they expect to be so near Boston as to furnish eggs warm from the nest.

Hon. Samuel L. Southard left Washington on the 24th for the South, in the hopes of recovering his health. It was supposed that he would yesterday (the 25th,) resign the office of President of the Senate until his health was improved, retaining however the post of Senator.—Albany Evening Journal.

The Assassination of Gov. Boggs.—The St. Louis Reporter of the 14th inst., has the following rumor:

Gov. Boggs.—We learn from a gentleman who arrived in this city on Tuesday evening from Warsaw, that there was a report current at the latter place that Gov. Boggs was dead. It is supposed that the assassin was one of Joe Smith's followers, and that he would be caught before he could reach Nauvoo. Letters, it was said had been written from Jefferson City to Gov. B. before his assassination, putting him on his guard against an assault threatened against his life by some Mormon fanatics. The information was sent to Jefferson City by several respectable persons, who had learned from a Mormon belonging to Nauvoo, that Joe Smith had been endeavoring to persuade some of his followers to murder Gov. B. for the course he took against them a few years ago. We give this rumor for what it is worth.

New York City Election—Decision of the Supreme Court.—It will be remembered that at the election of the Common Council in April, the canvass in the Sixth Ward was reported by the Inspectors to be illegal, because they were interrupted while counting the votes by the violence of a mob. In consequence of this, Mr. Mayor Morris refused to swear in those who claimed to be elected from the Ward, and those elected last year determined to hold over. This gave a Democratic majority in the Council. The Whigs who had been elected in the other Wards refused to sit in a Council composed in that way, and the rejected Whig members of the Sixth Ward sued out a mandamus, requiring the Mayor to swear them in. This was tried before the Supreme Court, now in session in New York, this week, and the unanimous decision was to grant the writ. Mr. Morris, however, refused to do it, and appealed to the Court of Errors. This body is composed of a majority of Democrats. This circumstance ought not to be allowed to affect the decision; but it is feared that it will. What the result will be remains to be seen.

New York and Erie Railroad.—The State Comptroller has advertised this road and its appurtenances to be sold at auction in Albany on the 1st of December next, in order to procure the payment of $41,344 87 due the State for interest on the $3,000,000 of State Stock loaned to said Company; which interest the Comptroller, by default of the Company, has been obliged to pay from the State Treasury.

Gold Digging is carried on successfully in Georgia. The Milledgeville Record of the 17th, says a new impetus has been given to the pursuit. In the neighborhood of Dahlonega there are from fifteen hundred to two thousand pennyweights found daily. At one mine on Battle Branch there was lately found one lump, worth, it is said, one hundred and twenty eight dollars. It is supposed from present prospects that there will be at least from 3 to $400,000 realized in that section from the pursuit in the present year. The late success in this business is drawing the attention of many others to it.

The Cunard Steamers.—It seems to be understood that these splendid boats, notwithstanding their success and the great sum they receive from the British Government, are losing money. It has come to be seriously considerd, whether it will not be necessary to change their port in this country to New York. The journey to Boston, small matter as it is, is yet found to be sufficient to cause a great many passengers to take the packets from this port, who would take the steamers if they were here. The postage regulations in this country and in England, are most unfair towards all vessels carrying letters, and certainly ought to be changed. The carrying of letters is the most important benefit which these steamers render to the world. The speed with which they communicate information, checks in the bud the adverse tendencies of trade. The laws of England prohibit the captains of vessels from taking pay for letters delivered here, except the two cents each, which is paid by the Post Offices. The steamers are therefore precluded from income from this most important service, and may perhaps be discontinued in consequence of the existence of laws which were adapted only to the state of navigation fifty years ago. A proposal was pending, by which a company of merchants offered to build several large steamers to form a line between this country and England, if only the law were altered so that they might collect postage on letters.—These steamers, upon this condition, the company offered to hold at the disposal of the government in case of war. A powerful addition would thus have been made to our navy, always ready for war, and not only without expense to the nation, but constantly rendering service to its interests. The Great Western receives on an average something like twenty-five hundred dollars on each outward voyage. The same sum the other way, would constitute a very important item in the question of profit and loss. The merchants would rather pay double the sum, than to forego the advantages of this rapid correspondence.—J. of Com.

The death of a Bird.—One of the admired Nightingales we spoke a few days ago of having been invited to hear, sang itself to death one or two mornings since. The two were in separate cages, suspended, one in the porch, the other in an adjacent room. They appeared to be engaged in a trial of their musical powers, and were exerting all their strength, rattling their wings, ruffling their feathers, jumping about their cages, varying and swelling their songs, until the whole air seemed filled with the sweet volumes they uttered. This they continued for some time, when one of them fainted away and died.—Richmond Compiler.

Horrid Outrage.—The Evansville (Indiana) Gazette of the 12th instant gives a detailed account of a heinous outrage committed by a Catholic priest in that place, on one of his female penitents, at the confessional. His crime is said to have been perpetrated under circumstances of great aggravation. The penitent is a young married woman, from Germany, of good character and family. The priest was arrested and held to bail in the sum of $4,000 for his appearance at the next session of the criminal Court. At the examination before the magistrates the offence was clearly proved, when a conflict took place between the Irish and German Catholics present, in midst of which the priest made his escape. The Gazette says that the leading members of the Catholic Church will see that he is brought to trial, and to punishment if guilty.

Indian Council near Buffalo.—The Indian Council near Buffalo has resulted in an amicable arrangement by treaty of the differences of the natives and the 'Ogden Company,' who hold a recognized right of pre-emption in the purchase of their lands. The treaty of 1838, which the Indians allege to be fraudulent and invalid, has been given up, and instead of their being bound to surrender all the reservations for a stipulated sum and remove to the West, they are to retain their Alleghany and Cattaraugus Reservations, and surrender that near Buffalo only, which they are allowed two years to remove from. The Ogden Company retain the right of pre-emption over the others of course, but solemnly guarantee the absolute inviolability of the Indian title thereto, until they choose to sell it. They are to have two years in which to remove from the Buffalo Reservation, and to be paid for it in proportion to the original price for the whole under the treaty of 1838. The council was attended by the venerable Ambrose Spencer on the part of the United States, Senator Nathan Dixon on behalf of this State, and Hon. Samuel Hoare on behalf Massachusetts, which State originally claimed this territory, and is bound by compacts to guard the rights of the Indians.) Of course every thing was conducted with uprightness and humanity.—Tribune.

Northeastern Boundary.—The Senate of Maine on Saturday, passed the preamble and resolutions reported by the joint select committee of the N. E. Boundary, by a vote of 30 yeas to 1 nay. These resolutions provide for the appointment of four Commissioners with full powers to assent to a conventional line. The resolutions came into the House from the Senate; and a minority or rather individual report was offered by one member of the Committee, contending for the line of 1783. On the proposition to print 1000 copies of this report, some discussion arose, pending which, the House, by a vote of 81 to 80, adjourned to Monday.

PROPOSALS
For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and, we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers, to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. Every stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25, those wishing to vote by proxy, can do so, by forwarding their votes to some one of the stockholders; naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting also their number of shares.

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

By ANDREW URE, M. D, F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc N. Germ. Hanov., Mulii, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo. pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞ To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

 To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51:12

CONSUMPTION.

DR. TAYLORS Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

This most useful medicine can without presumption be called the "ne plus ultra" of all the thousand medicines now offered to the public for the cure of pulmonary diseases. Hundreds are now living in good health that consumption seemed to have marked for an early grave, who owe their preservation to the use of Taylor's Balsam of Liverwort.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs, ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1,000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.—Within the last few years the calls for this sovereign remedy have been immense, beyond precedent; and its reputation sustained from Maine to Mobile; thus proving the confidence bestowed upon a simple medical preparation, purely vegetable, and the truly astonishing effect attending its use. Physicians, too, from a conviction of its mildness, safety and success, employ it in their practice, recommend it to their patients, and esteem this medicine safe and invaluable.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended. The inestimable value of this celebrated medicine has been rightly tested and found not wanting. The Proprietor is daily receiving the most flattering accounts of its success; and it is truly gratifying to say this is emphatically the medicine of the people! It is used by the Medical Faculty, supported by the Clergy, and advocated by the whole New York Press, and is in the house of most of our citizens.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption: composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

ROOF'S SPECIFIC.

FOR the cure of RING BONE, SPAVIN, WIND GALLS, &c. &c. ☞A certain cure in all cases.☜ Many certificates can be shown, and will be if wished, to place this inestimable specific as a perfect cure, beyond a doubt.

WORMS! WORMS!

DR. M. HITCHCOCK'S unrivalled and unequalled Worm Tea, a sovereign remedy for Worms. This invaluable medicine has been tested by the experience of more than ten years, and used administered to more than 18 000 persons of various ages, and not one solitary complaint, for in no one of the thousands of instances, where it has been used agreeable to the printed direction, has it ever failed.

N. B. Ask for Dr. M. Hitchcock's Worm Tea, as there are many nostrums abroad for the destruction of worms.

We also state, for the benefit of the afflicted, that we have the following valuable MEDICINES, among our large stock.

POETRY.

From the Christian Reflector.

The Orphan Boy.

If sympathy can touch my heart,
'Tis for an orphan child,
When death with his unerring dart,
Has chilled life's purple tide,
And spread destruction wide,
And changed the aspect mild,
Of that loved, happy home,
Where sorrow ne'er had come.

That voice no more salutes thy ear,
Which once, in accents sweet,
Caused thy young heart, when thou didst hear,
To leap with joy and glee;
When father spake to thee—
And him with gladness greet,
Ere thou couldst lisp his name,
Or his protection claim.

O, Father of the fatherless!
Smile on that lonely boy.;
God of the widow, bless! O bless!
Stretch forth thy mighty arm,
And shield from every harm;
Fill that young heart with joy,
Which earth can never yield,
From verdant wood or field.

Throw o'er his young, defenceless head
Thy broad protecting shield;
And dew of heavenly graces shed,
To nerve with quenchless power,
In every trying hour,
That he may never yield,
When fiery trials come,
And many seal their doom.

May the lone widowed mother see
Her care, and toil, and pain,
Her many prayers sent up for thee,
Yield a rich harvest here,
And far beyond this rolling sphere,
Result in everlasting gain,
On heaven's resplendent shore,
When time shall be no more! J. H. B.

THE LOST CHILD.

A THRILLING STORY.

"A child is lost!" was the fearful and pulse-stilling rumor that coursed like wild-fire throughout one of those small settlements which occasionally skirt the entrance to our American forests. A cry like this, was enough to thrust the warm blood back to the heart with the chill of horror; to arrest the throb of joy, even in its gayest humors; and to send the busy imagination forth with the little wanderer in the deep solitude of the forest; whom it pictured, seeking in vain to discover some opening, while he wiped away the tears that were flowing over his young face like rain; holding himself in an attitude to listen, till his startled fancy brought back the growl of some hideous inhabitant of those dark places; then, running onward, would either fall a prey to the very fate he was endeavoring to flee from; or, after threading the same little circle, till fatigue overpowered his feeble limbs, lay himself down, despairingly to die. Such tragedies had been acted; and the sons of the forest well knew that it is easier to pursue their course through the trackless ocean without a compass, than to ascertain their pathway in those deep wilds, where the light of the sun is almost excluded, and no foot-print guides to human habitations.

In the present instance men crowded together, scarcely daring to whisper to their own souls that the sweet child of Agnes Wade was lost. "He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow!" Can there be a picture of more utter desolation, than the heart of the bereaved one under such circumstances? Agnes Wade was the idol of the settlement. She had been in it but a few fleeting months; yet they had been time enough for her memory and her interest to find a resting place in every bosom. She had come there to reside, with the parents of her lost husband—They were in humble life, but it needed only to look at Agnes, to know that she had been educated in refinement, if not in elegance. And she had borne the change of circumstances with so much sweet and pious resignation; she was so gentle, so condescending, so benevolent, that it was impossible to be with her and not to love her. She always had a word of encouragement for the timid; she always whispered consolation to the sorrowful; that consolation that cometh from above. With irresistible persuasion she endeavored to reclaim the vicious, and lead the contrite spirit to "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world."

Agnes Wade was young. She had married the husband of her affections; one to whom her fond vows of constancy had been yielded almost in childhood. His parents had labored hard to give him an education; and it was during his college years, that he saw and loved the delicate and attractive Agnes. Their hearts, as it were, melted into one. The opinions and feelings of William Wade were reflected in the mind and soul of his sweet and betrothed one; and when they wedded, it was only to make the blending of interests more closely intimate. But happiness so perfect cannot abide long in a world which has been blasted by the frown of its Creator.

Dreams that are so delightful, must have a sudden, if not a fearful waking. Two years had passed since Agnes had felt all the misery, which is comprised in that one word—widow. She had known sorrow before in the loss of her yougest born; but it was as the few drops which precede the torrent. She committed its body to the dust in the sure hope that its spirit was even at that moment mingling in kindred holiness and happiness with the blessed in Heaven; that it was a bright angel around the throne of God; and it was a thought full of beauty and full of consolation, that she had been the honored instrument of adding one to those pure spirits, who dwell in the blissful presence of their Redeemer. But when the grave closed over HIM, who had been her guardian, her counsellor, her support; who had shared her joys, and soothed her sorrows; who had been her companion in health, and pillowed her head in sickness; she felt as if shut out from the loveliness of life forever; and she would willingly have laid her throbbing temples and despairing heart on the cold earth beside him, never more to rise.

Agnes was left without fortune, but she contrived, by economy and industry, to keep herself from absolute dependance, and was always able to bestow the widow's mite in charity. She treated her son as a companion—he was associated in her visits of benevolence—he shared in her labors with all the strength and ingenuity his young days could furnish.

It was this darling son—this fair pledge of her young affections—that was no where to be found. It was a bright day in spring, and Agnes had risen with the sun, and gone several miles to visit a dying friend. On this occasion she left her little dear Will behind, contenting herself with imprinting a mother's kiss upon his glowing cheek, as he lay wrapped in slumber. "Is he not the sweetest of all sweet Children?" thought she, as she turned to look once more upon his sleeping loveliness.—"Oh, if I were bereft of him too, I should have nothing left to live for!"

The hours and the moments sped away until the time arrived when Agnes was expected. Ah! who shall be the first to tell her of the heavy tidings? All shrunk from the task. She came—yes, they could not help her coming!—and there they sat crowded together in a little circle, as children press together when they are listening to something frightful—all eyes turned upon her, with sad and fearful meaning; but not a word was uttered.

"What is the matter?" she quickly asked—"Where is my child?—Something dreadful has occurred!—Oh, tell me! where is my child? Father!—Mother!—will not you speak to me? Then he is dead!—The judgment is at last administered—the righteous judgment which I have been so long anticipating!" She continued in a low plaintive moan, as if communing with her own spirit; "Oh! I have loved him too fondly—better than I have loved my God!—I tried hard not to do it. But, oh! he was so sweet, so engaging, so affectionate! He was my last, too—the last being left on earth that I could call my own!—the last!—do you hear that, Agnes?—The last!—and that is taken! Yes! I am left alone—alone, and solitary in all this world—it has nothing now for me to love—and I too may die!"

Exhausted by the strength of her emotions, she sunk into the arms of the sympathizing females who had clustered around her, penetrated to the soul by this, to them, novel exhibition of maternal grief. There were no tears, no wringing of the hands, no frantic exclamations; but the low breathings of utter desolation—the solitary joy cut off, in a heart long familiarized to sorrow—the one overflowing drop added to a cup already full of bitterness. Every tongue was silent as if spell-bound. Either they dared not awaken the least glimmering of hope, lest it should be again extinguished in deeper darkness; or they were afraid the suspense excited by their intelligence might be worse for her than the most painful certainty. Agnes was conveyed to bed, and the good women left her to consult together what it was best to do. It was determined that one should return to her and tell her the whole truth.

She found her giving vent to her heart in the most pathetic exclamations. "My sweet, sweet Will! I had hoped that we should enter heaven together! that together we should join the dear ones who have gone before us! Oh! what do I say? Father! save me from sin! save me from murmuring at thy righteous chastenings! Teach me to trust in thee, although thou slay me!

"Yes; that is right, child! put your trust in Heaven! the Lord is good, and he is kind, and He will comfort you; so don't take on so," said the warm-hearted old lady, addressing Agnes.

The voice of affection brought tears to to the dry eyes of Agnes. But they were not the refreshing tears that moisten and cool the withering spirit—they came not gently and sweetly, like the dews of heaven. The short, convulsive heavings of an almost bursting heart, were mingled with violent and painful weeping. This soon spent itself, and was succeeded by suffocating sobs; like the swelling of ocean when the storm is gone. The affectionate woman leaned over her persuasively.

"Nay! now dearie, you do wrong to grieve so; you must submit to the will of God!"

"Oh!" Interrupted Agnes, "I would I could resign myself entirely to his justice! but my soul is full of darkness! I can only remember that my child is DEAD."—This one thought had occupied her mind; but now, as if a new light had broken in upon her, she suddenly raised herself from the pillow—"Dead? who says that he is dead! Where, how, when did he die?"

"He is not dead! dearie, not dead!"

"Not dead?" cried Agnes, starting up, "for the love of Heaven, tell me what you mean! oh, speak! where is he?"

Both hands were upon her bosom, as if to hold in her throbbing heart; and the wildness of her looks made the old woman tremble.

"Be quiet, my child! only be quiet, and I will tell you all about it! The dear little boy was playing at the door, and picking daisies to stick in your hair. He was so much diverted by it that his grandmother only let him play on, telling him not to go away from the door. She was busied about the dairy, and when she come to look after him he was gone. She gave the alarm right away, and all the men in the settlement turned out to hunt him up.—But you know the woods is a bad place to find a body!"—

Agnes stopped not to hear the conclusion of the sentence. She was at the door in an instant.

The old woman pulled her forcibly back—"are you crazy?" said she; "Do you want to get lost too? If man can find him, he will be brought in before sundown!"

While she was yet speaking, several men who had been out in quest of the little wanderer, returned, despairing of success.

"Let none but MOTHERS search!" cried Agnes, and darted from the house. They called to her in vain. One of the party who had just arrived, followed; hallooing, as he went, to his comrades, to light a fire for a beacon, if they returned not before night.

Agnes fled on with incredible rapidity. Affection lent her wings, and strength and courage; or rather, she was supported by Him who with such sweet and powerful emphasis, declares himself "the God of the widow, and the Father of the fatherless." With the lightness and speed of the antelope, she passed over the brush and underwood, that sometimes lay scattered iu her pathway. Difficulties seemed to vanish as she approached them; and she explored every little hiding-place that might conceal her darling, with an ingenuity and industry resulting from the mighty workings of a mother's love, that amounted almost to intuition. Her companion looked on with wonder at her performances; to see a creature so delicate, do that which appeared to require the strength and judgment of a man. He pretended not to cope with her in the search she was accomplishing. He seemed but the passive instrument of her pleasure; but the humble satellite attendant upon the evolutions of its mighty planet.

"I must find my boy!" she exclaimed, "or the forests will receive us both into the same grave! But I shall find him!—He who has ever been my guide in dificulties, my defence in temptation, my strength in weakness, and my consolation in sorrow, will give him back to me! My trust is in he Lord!"

Agnes went on and on. She knew not how far she had traversed the forest, for there are no waymarks to ascertain the distance or direction; and one may wander on for hours and days, and terminate their journey near the very place where they comenced it. She soon came to a spot more open than she had hitherto passed; where the wild flowers and the winter green grew in such abundance as almost to cover the earth with a rich carpet of scarlet, and green, and purple. Agnes's heart beat quicker as she thought—"Ah! this is a place which would attrackt my darling!" She almost expected to see him sleeping on the bed of flowers before her. She cast a rapid glance around—

"William?"

She paused, expecting a reply—

"My darling Will?"

There was a slight rustling in the bushes near her. She flew with outstretched arms to clasp her son—but it was only the young fawn who had been startled from his slumbers. Agnes' heart died within her. She felt the sickness of "hope deferred." The transition from expectation, from almost certainty, to disapointment, had been so abrupt and so decisive, that she seated herself on the cold grass, and wept in uncontrolled emotion.

"Cheer up lady!" said her companion; "don't be down-hearted! the boy will yet be found, if human nature can accomplish it, for I never saw any body so 'cute in the woods as you be. And besides all that, you trust in the Lord, and the good book says, that "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

"It is true!" replied Agnes, "and it is thankless ingratitude in me to be so unmindful of His precious promises, and so distrustful of His goodness; but my heart hovers over my remaining treasure, as the bird flutters around the only nursling that is left in her rifled nest. Come, let us on! the sun will soon be setting, and alas! for my little one, if he should have to spend the night in the lone desert!"

They pursued their search—but Agnes with less buoyant hopes than before. As hers faded, the faint expectations of her companion vanished utterly; and he gently hinted that she had better consult her own safety and return.

"I will DIE here," she replied "rather than desert my precious boy! Do you go home, and leave me? the God of the widow will be my safe-guard!"

"No, no, lady! no, no! I did'nt speak on my own account! Laws me! I don't value it at all; many's the night I've laid in the woods, with no cover but the blessed heavens."

The shadows of evening gathered slowly round them; and the trees of the forest began to assume in the twilight those fearful and unearthly forms which excite startling fancies even in the stout-hearted.—Agnes thought of the helpness and ignorance, of the timidity and cowardice of children, and the situation of her desolate little one came over her clad in tenfold horrors. In the anguish of her soul she supplicated,

"Oh God! thou hearer of prayer—thou Father of the fatherless! in mercy lead a mother to her child! For his sake who while on earth never turned a beggar from his feet, oh, listen to my cry!"

"Hark! do you not hear something?" she said quickly, turning to her companion. They stood still—"There it is again!—oh harken!" Every faculty was now strained to its utmost point to ascertain the nature of the sound.

"It is!—it is!—Oh God! thou hast heard my prayer! it is his angel voice!—Be still, my soul!—oh, which way does it come? my heart beats so violently I cannot listen!"

"Quiet yourself, lady! said the man who now distinctly heard the soft sweet accents of a child.

"Oh look! look!" said Agnes, whose eyes seemed as if they would penetrate the thickening darkness of the forest in their intensity.

"There he is! kneeling on that rock; that hard, bare rock. My child! my precious boy! Oh God, I thank thee!"—She sunk upon her knees but a few paces from her prostrate child.

The little William was soon locked fast in the arms of his doating and now happy mother; and was relating to her the simple story of his wanderings; his alarm; his trust in God; his ascent upon the rock to see if he could discover any signs of habitation; his consequent disappointment; and the feelings with which he was submitting to his lot, while his sympathizing protector shed tears of pleasure and admiration.

The happy party were soon seated, but they were not long obliged to wait. The beacon which they had kindled streamed upward to the heavens, and showed them, to their astonishment, that they were not very far from their own dwellings. The light of a brilliant moon shone upon their footsteps, and Agnes, and the kind-hearted associate of her search, returned laden with the treasure they had so effectually sought. They returned to awaken happiness in the hearts which they left sorrowing, and to render devout thanksgiving to the widow's God and orphan's Father.

TO TOBACCO CHEWERS.—The following remarks are from the Licking Valley Register. Justice to a certain portion of community demands their republication at our hands: "We have been requested to urge decency and good manners upon tobacco chewers who visit other people's houses, particularly to those who attend meetings. It is certainly very unpleasant for the lady of a house to be compelled to wash out a room, not only the floor, but the walls, after a neighborly gathering. Common mud would not be complained of, but tobacco spit is as abominable as it is unnecessary. Decency will take the hint."

PREACHING BACKWARD.—Some time ago, a Universalist contrived to procure admission into a pulpit, on a Lord's day morning, when the regular preacher happened to be absent. The minister returned in the afternoon, and after the usual services, one of his sons, then a boy about ten years of age, said to him: "Father, I went to hear the strange preacher this morning."

"What was his text?"

"The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."

"What did he make of it?"

"He said there were no wicked people and no hell, and no nations that forget God. "He preached all backward!"

It is one of the best criticisms I ever heard upon heretical sermons.—Christian Intelligencer.

Audubon.—In the May number of the Democratic Review, is the annunciation, which the friends of the great—truly great Ornithologist,—will read with equal surprise and delight, that during the last winter, which Mr. Audubon had spent in the city of New York, he has worked on an average fourteen hours a day, preparing a work on the Quadrupeds of America, similar to his work on Birds. The drawings, already finished, of the size of life, are master-pieces in their way, surpassing, if that be possible, in fidelity and brilliancy, all that he has done before. Early in the summer, he will depart to continue his labor in the woods.

CHILDREN.

Bless them! We love to hear their sweet voices, ringing cheerily and clear under the open sky. We love those noisy games of which they are so fond—the mirth that startles Echo from her sleep—

And shows the native gladness of their hearts.

Here they are, bareheaded, and some of them barefooted, but health blooming upon their cheeks and rapture sparkling in their eyes. Look at this little party gamboling on the greensward. Over they go—heels over head! What care they for the hard knocks they get in falling! And how delighted are they—what a shout of merriment is set up when one of their number rolls into the ditch! Happy children, tumble on!—gambol whilst ye may! the days are coming when you must toil for the poor pittance that buys your daily bread; when the cares of life will weigh heavily on your hearts, now so bounding and so elated!—Enjoy the blissful present, then, as much as you can—there is no time to be lost.—Over again!

See the young urchin, with red cheeks and flaxen curls, paddling in the runnel that bustles along under your hedgeside!—How he loves to feel the cool water dance over his toes! How eagerly he pounces upon the minnow that darts from beneath the mossy stone before him, or comes flitting down the stream! How he flogs the tall weed with his stick; and delights in making a puddle of the crystal brooklet!

Observe that pretty black-eyed girl, in the blue frock, with the toddling youngster by her side! She is making a garden in the dust, with twigs of trees, flowers plucked from the hedge row, white pebbles, and bits of broken crockery picked up in the lane. And how pleased is little Davie with the contrivance! Now he fetches a stone and stops up a gap in the border—now a blade of grass or an unmeaning straw, sticking it with the profoundest judgment in the middle of the miniature walk, or exactly in the place where it should not be. With the spirit of mischief, he now runs over the labored work, and destroys their little Eden, trampling under foot its flowrets and its bowers,

"And laughs to see the ruin he has wrought."

See, he is now astride the grazing ass, supported by his sister. How he kicks and jumps, and opens wide his eyes, and fancies himself going to market! Now he is unsupported—his sister has withdrawn her arm. How grave, how motionless! His tiny faculties seem to be busily questioning the danger. The ass lifts a leg—Davie's courage fails him—he makes a comical wry face, and begins to whimper—and Davie stretches out his little arm for help!—What a delightful poem is that of Mary Howitt's on little children! Here it is.—Reader! If thou, like ourself, art fond of the prattling and engaging creatures of which it speaks, thou wilt love it, and take it to thy heart forever.

Sporting through the forest wide,
Playing by the water side,
Wandering o'er the healthy fells,
Down within the woodland dells,
All among the mountains wild,
Dwelleth many a little child!

In the baron's hall of pride,
By the poor man's dull fireside,
'Mid the mighty, 'mid the mean,
Little children may be seen;
Like the flowers that spring up fair,
Bright and countless every where.

In the fair isles of the main,
In the desert's lone domain,
In the savage mountain glen,
'Mong the tribes of swarthy men;
Wheresoe'r the sun hath shone,
On a league of peopled ground,
Little children may be found!

Blessings on them!—they in me
Move a kindly sympathy,
With their wishes, hopes and fears,
With their laughter and their tears,
With their wonder so intense,
And their small experience!

Little children, not alone
On this wide earth are you known;
'Mid its labor and its cares,
'Mid its suffering and its snares;
Free from sorrow, free from strife,
In the world of love and life,
Where no sinful thing hath trod,
In the presence of our God!
Spotless, blameless, glorified,
Little children, ye abide!

We seldom behold children at their play without being carried back to the days of our childhood, when we were one of those "wee things," and loved to gambol on the greensward, and gather buttercups in the fields. Many a little garden have we made in the dust, loaded ourselves with many a big posey, chased many a butterfly and young bird in those early days. How light was our heart! How blithe our spirits, with scarce a tint of care! With what speed and rapture we bounded to our merry play fellows!—How we shouted, and ran, and leapt for joy! Sweet days of our childhood! How bright they were!—Why passed ye so soon away? Why were ye so fleeting and so transitory? In our depressed and sorrowful moments, when care sits gloomily on our brow, when troubles encompass us, and a weight of sadness lies at our heart, we cast an eye back to the morning of our life, and from its unclouded sunniness, a cheering ray steals into our soul and dispels, for a time, all gloom.—What would we not give to be a child once more!

"SAY YOUR PRAYERS IN FAIR WEATHER."

Returning by the Belfast night-mail to my distant parish in the north, from the Dublin clerical meetings of the year 1839, I found myself opposite to a gentleman whose appearance engrossed, rather than attracted, my most profound attention.

His age, as he afterwards told me, was sixty; and perhaps I should have conjectured as much, though exposure to weather, cares, anxieties, and dangers, with a certain air of seriousness which seemed, as it were, to preside over them all, spoke, more than the effects of time, the progress of my fellow traveler's earthly pilgrimage. In truth, his countenance was such a one as no observant physiognomist would contemplate without interest, or mark its amiable and diversified expression without respect and love. The coach in which we sat had scarcely cleared the pavement, and rolling along the comparatively silent highway, when my companion addressed me with great ease and politeness. A few minutes sufficed to show that the predominating sentiment of his heart was religion. His conversation was almost exclusive of that character; and, as he poured out the rich stores of Gospel truth and experience from the exhaustless treasury of a converted soul, the night insensibly wore away, and the sun was long risen as we changed horses at the last stage.

Little more than an hour remained, and I must probably part forever from a man by whose conversation I had been expressly captivated. I felt, as may be easily conceived, a strong desire to learn his history, and thus fix more permanently on my mind the impression he had made. Accordingly, I asked him whether the turning of his heart to God had been caused by any sudden danger, or merely connected with his sea-faring life, (he had already told me that he commanded a vessel trading between Liverpool and America,) or was a gradual growth. My question seemed to please him; at least he replied to it with the utmost courtesy, saying, that in the last year but one of the late war, he was waiting in port with a fleet of merchantmen till a convoy should arrive, it being deemed unsafe to sail without such protection. His habits, he observed, had always been exceedingly irregular, to give them no stronger term; and he passed the period of detention in practices he could not look back on without sorrow.

At length the signal to weigh anchor was made; his ship, as were also many others, was short of hands, so that he was glad to accept of any person who offered himself, however unexperienced he might be in navigation. At the very instant of departure a boat came alongside, out of which a tall robust man climbed actively upon deck, and gave himself in as a seaman, ready to engage for the voyage. The boat which brought him had returned to the shore, and the wind was blowing nearly a gale; but under every circumstance, my friend said he was glad to get even the addition of one equivocal hand to his scanty crew.—His pleasure however was of short duration, for the new-comer was soon found to be of a most quarrelsome, untractable disposition, a furious blasphemer, and when opportunity offered, a drunkard. Besides all these disqualifications, he was wholly ignorant of nautical affairs, or counterfeited ignorance to escape duty. In short, he was the bane and plague of the vessel, and refused obstinately to give any account of himself or his family, or his past life.

At length a violent storm arose, all hands were piped upon deck, and all, as the captain thought, were too few to save the ship. When the men were mustered to their quarters, the sturdy blasphemer was missing, and my friend went below to seek for him; great was his surprise at finding him on his knees, repeating the Lord's Prayer with wonderful rapidity, over and over again, as if he had bound himself to countless reiterations. Vexed at what he deemed hypocrisy or cowardice, he shook him roughly by the collar, saying, "say your prayers in fair weather." The man rose up, observing in a low voice, "God grant I may ever see fair weather to say them."

In a few hours the storm happily abated, a week more brought them to the harbor, and an incident so trivial passed quickly away from the memory of the captain—the more easily, as the man in question was paid off the day after landing, and appeared not again.

Four more years had elapsed, during which, though my friend had twice been shipwrecked, and was grievously hurt by the falling of a spar, he pursued, without amendment, a life of profligacy and contempt to God. At the end of this period he arrived in the port of New York, after a very tedious and dangerous voyage from England.

It was on a Sabbath morning, and the streets were thronged with persons proceeding to the several houses of worship with which the city abounds; but the narrator, from whose lips I take this anecdote, was bent on another occupation, designing to drown the recollections of perils and deliverances in a celebrated tavern, which he had too long and too often frequented.

As he walked leisurely towards this goal, he encountered a very dear friend, the quondam associate of many a thoughtless hour. Salutations over, the captain seized him by the arm, declaring that he should accompany him to the hotel. "I will do so," replied the other with great calmness, "on condition that you will come with me first, for a single hour, into this house (a church,) and thank God for his mercies to you on the deep." The captain was ashamed to refuse, so the two friends entered the temple together.

Already all the seats were occupied, and a dense crowd filled the aisle; but by dint of personal exertion they succeeded in reaching a position in front of the pulpit, at about five yards distance. The preacher, one of the most popular of the day, riveted the attention of the entire congregation, including the captain himself, to whom his features and voice—though he could not assign any time or place of previous meeting—seemed not wholly unknown, particularly when he spoke with animation. At length the preacher's eye fell upon the spot where the two friends stood. He suddenly paused—still gazing upon the captain as if to make himself sure that he labored under no optical delusion—and after a silence of more than a minute, pronounced, with a voice that shook the building, "Say your prayers in fair weather."

The audience was lost in amazement; nor was it until a considerable time had elapsed, that the preacher recovered self-possession to recount the incident with which the reader is already acquainted; adding, with deep emotion, that the words which his captain uttered in the storm, had clung to him by day and by night after his landing, as if an angel had been charged with the duty of repeating them in his ears; that he felt the holy call as coming directly from above, to do the work of his crucified Master; that he had studied at college for the ministry, and was now, through grace, such as they saw and heard.

At the conclusion of this affecting address, he called on the audience to join in prayer with himself, that the same words might be blessed in turn to him who first had used them. But God had outrun their petitions—my friend was already his child before his former shipmate had ceased to tell his story. The power of the Spirit had wrought effectually upon him, and subdued every lofty imagination. And so, when the people dispersed, he exchanged the hotel for the house of the preacher, with whom he tarried six weeks, and parted from him to pursue his profession, with a heart devoted to the service of the Savior, and with a holy and happy assurance, which (as he declared to me, and I confidently rely in its truth,) advancing years hallowed, strengthened and sanctified.

From that companion of a night I then parted, probably not to meet again till we stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. His history is too palpably instructive to require that I should add my own reflections. And with one only I conclude—addressing those persons who seek God merely in the hours of danger and trouble, in the words of the captain,—"Say your prayers in fair weather."

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS FOR THOSE CHRISTIANS WHO THINK THERE IS NOTHING THEY CAN DO.

1. Can you not labor for the salvation of those souls which are directly under your influence? The feeling which prompts the expression, I can do nothing, is usually excited by contemplating a broad and distinct field of activity—that fancied field called the world—on which the renowned are figuring, and where those mighty deeds are wrought which fill the trump of fame. Sensible of your inability to cope with such giant spirits, you shrink away entirely, and almost resolve never again to leave the retirement of your family circle. Well, suppose such a resolve were made, (though it were rash and unwarranted,) and you should shut yourself up at home. What do you find there? A little world! a sphere of labor and usefulness unspeakably important!

Now I would follow you, where, to escape more public responsibility, you have retreated, and there I would lay upon you the strong grasp of special obligation.—Surely you will not say, I can do nothing at home. Then devote yourself to the promotion of the spiritual interests of your children, your husband, your wife, your domestics. In all probability God has given you an influence over these, which no one, not even your pastor has. And further, you may stand in the way of others doing them good, if you are unfaithful to them yourself. This is certainly true very often. We have been in families where we had no heart to labor for the souls of the children and servants, because we saw that the professedly pious parents were right in the way. Remember then your own household—take care of that; and by the time all your children and servants are converted, you will find that you can do something out of doors.

2. Cultivate a good spirit yourself—a spirit of meekness, love, and peace. Thus you will be 'a living epistle, read and known of all men.'

3. Be a consistent Christian in your worldly business. Let it appear unto all men that you conduct business not on selfish principles, nor with a selfish end, but with an eye single to the glory of God.—Would you not do much good if you lived thus, uniformly, habitually? And are you not bound so to live? Will any inferiority of intellect or education release you from the obligation to "walk worthy of your vocation?"

4. You can do incalculable good by living "as pilgrims and strangers on the earth," and by "declaring plainly that you seek a country." One of the crying evils of our time is, that too many professed pilgrims are "mindful of the country from whence they came out, and seek opportunity to return;" now you may do a great service to the kingdom of Christ if you will let your lives be a constant rebuke of this lusting after the flesh pots of Egypt.

Wanted—WANTED, are both men and women who will show what it is to be a pilgrim! It is to be feared that many have taken up with this world as their abiding city. It used to be, twenty or thirty years ago, quite common to hear Christians talk about this world being a wilderness, through which (with weary and oftentimes bloody feet,) they were traveling home; but it would seem to have become of late so much improved and cultivated that it makes quite a snug home—scarce inferior to heaven. This is lamentable truly. Now, dear brother, will you be one whose life (not lips merely) shall 'declare plainly' that this world is still a wilderness—that there is no abiding city short of the new Jerusalem?

5. Lastly, let me beg that you will repudiate for ever the notion that you are too ignorant and weak to be useful. There is no one notion which has been more fruitful of mischief in the church. It operates upon the mass of Christians, excluding them from the field of active effort, and confining the labor to the few who are gifted by nature, endowed by education, or empowered by official station. The consequence is that the great body of Christians, like passengers on a vessel, lay swinging in their hammocks, or sunning upon the deck, depending for a prosperous voyage upon the toil and vigilance of a few weather-beaten sailors.

The sacramental hosts, instead of being all and each clad in the whole armor of God, and moving on "firm paced," like a select, well disciplined army, are more like the confused myriads of an ancient Persian armament, a large proportion mere appendages, swelling the number, but diminishing the real effective force.

It most manifestly was never the design of God that the vital energy of his church should be pent up in a few. He never meant that a handful of vigorous souls should bear the burthen and heat of the day, and carry the remainder, like so much lifeless luggage, on their shoulders besides. No! Every Christian was meant to be 'a living soul,' a fruit-bearing branch, a miniature image of his Lord, an imitation of Christ the risen, not the buried; every Christian was ordained to be a light in the world—a doer, a self-denier. True, some were appointed to be hands, and others to be feet, but the latter were to be as devoted and diligent as the former. Shall the foot destroy, or what amounts to the same, deny its power of action and be justified in so doing, because it is not the hand?

If I were to mention that which more than any thing else, in my opinion, retards the progress of Christ's cause, I should point, not to watchmen slumbering on their posts, not to leaders recreant to their trust, not to teachers proclaiming error, not to prophets prophecying smooth things, but to the great body of Christians casting off responsibility, shrinking from their places, and leaving the rich, the official, and the educated to do all. J. WINTER AND SUMMER CHRISTIANS.

When the business of spring opens on the world, the spirituality of the church is often lost. Many a revival of religion has been arrested and dissipated by the influx of worldly cares at this stirring season of the year. Almost every class of business men hope for a revival of business, and as a common result the concerns of the church must be neglected, while the world is worshiped. Thus God and mammon come in conflict, and too frequently does the latter gain the victory. We can not serve them both at once, and fearing to acknowledge the god of this world as our God, we make a compromise, seeking to follow mammon for a season, with the understanding, implied if not expressed, that God's claims shall be met and answered as soon as the busy season is over.

Wisely have many pastors improved the months of comparative rest, by making a vigorous onset upon the kingdom of Satan. They have redoubled their diligence to bring sinners to the knowledge of the truth, and that, not because God is more willing, or the sinner less stubborn in winter than in summer, but because it is more easy to persuade men to turn their attention to the subject of religion at such times than when the world's demands are stronger and more urgent. The imperfections of Christians is also regarded; they are more ready to serve God without sacrifice than with, and will therefore give their time and attention more freely to the promotion of the church in those seasons of the year when little can be done in the way of making money.

To some men, to some classes of men these remarks do not apply. Perhaps to them the winter is the harvest time. Perhaps they are equally driven with business through the year. But the great majority of men, nine out of ten, probably, look to the winter for rest from the pressing cares of the world, and in spring they expect to plunge with fresh energy into the vortex of business, and struggle with it till the earth is chilled with frost, the avenues of transportation are choked with ice, and the rest of another winter sets in, and allows them time to serve the Lord.

Against this periodical religion we wish to protest. Against this compromise on the part of the Christian, we would bear solemn testimony, while we call on the friends of God to let the friends of mammon know that our God lives all the year and has a claim to the undivided heart and service of those who are called by his name. But in spite of this call, in spite of the explicit warnings of the word of God, in spite of conscientious convictions of duty, unless the season on which we are entering differs materially from those that have past, there will be a sad declension in the churches. It will appear at first in the meetings for social prayer.—They will be more formal and less fervent; their numbers will diminish, and perhaps the meetings themselves will be suspended; the solemnity of the public services of the sanctuary will, in many cases appear to be less deep; anxious inquirers will be rare and conversions very few; Christians will not speak so often to one another as they have been wont concerning the Redeemer's kingdom; the world will crowd even into the Christian's closet and chill his devotions, and make them short and few; many a family altar, especially for the morning sacrifice will be broken down, and thus the spirituality of individuals, and consequently of the whole church, will be gradually worn away. Sad and mortifying as such a prophecy is, it is too probable to be doubted, and is uttered with the hope that the churches may determine to make it false. Scoffers will doubtless glory in such predictions, and urge them as evidence that revivals are mere animal excitements which vary with the weather, but the truth should be told that it may reprove, though the enemy make it an occasion to blaspheme. And there are reasons why we are encouraged to hope that this opening year will not be marked by a declension of religion so general as that which has been the feature of past years.

Revivals are just beginning in many churches. We have been looking out for them, expecting to hear of the stately steppings of the Most High in various parts of the land. The tidings are coming. From the north and the south, the east and the west, the glad news is brought that God is visiting his people, reviving the heart of his contrite ones and winning sinners to himself. These seasons of refreshing have commenced at such a period that it is natural to cherish the hope of their continuance, notwithstanding the unfavorable circumstances with which they may be encompassed.

Christians are also less inclined than formerly to depend on periodical excitements. The importance of steady effort is acknowledged and felt. Spiritual health is not marked by fits and starts. And this truth gains rapidly on the church, and under its influence the people of God will gird themselves for prolonged and ceaseless exertions in the cause of Christ. Rest is not to be expected this side of eternity, and if Christians adopt this sentiment, revivals will multiply and spread and meet revivals, the Sun of righteousness will never go down, but shine with brighter and still brighter lustre till the perfect day of millenial glory pours its radiance over an evangelized world. The church is looking for the coming of the Son of man. The sound of his chariot wheels is heard in the distance, and surely the servants will not slumber when the Lord is at hand.

And another reason why we look for more attention to religion during the spring and summer, is found in the fact that there is no prospect that business will be very pressing through the present season. Business men are daily and hourly complaining of dull times, and if there is nothing to do for this world why not do something for the next? We know of facts that occurred in 1837 which encourage us in the hope that temporal adversity may be overruled for spiritual good. Let those who find their business dull, inquire sincerely, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and an answer may be returned which shall call into the active service of Christ a host of those who have hitherto been recreant to their Master, in the very hour when their aid was most loudly demanded.

THE TRINITY.

Whilst we cherish with gratitude and admiration the stupendous revelation of a Trinity in Unity in the Godhead, holding to it as the very epitome of our faith, the vital and essential part of the doctrines of Christianity, let us not for a moment forget that the great end of the communication of this mystery, was not to astonish and perplex our understandings, but to amend and purify our hearts, and influence our practice. In the moral and spiritual, as in the material world, miracles are no where uselessly expended: nor has Divine Providence shown such condescension to the pride of human research as to reveal its most awful mysteries, for the mere indulgence of an idle and petulant curiosity.—We do not as yet know even ourselves: do not let us then imagine that we can apprehend God. Let those then, on the one hand, who may be inclined to scoff at this mysterious doctrine, because they choose to imagine that the idea of a threefold yet single nature involves a contradiction of terms, and, consequently, an absurdity,—let such check themselves for a single moment in their career of dogmatical philosophy, and contemplate what, though apparently more level with their capacity, is at the same time a miracle far beyond all human explication, namely, the mysterious construction of their own nature. They will there find two totally distinct substances, body and spirit, as decidedly two in all their phenomena and operations as it is possible to conceive; yet united to form one sentient, intellectual creature. I do not mean to say that this is a correct, much less an adequate illustration of the union of three several Persons in the same Divine Being: in all probability it is very far removed from it. But this I do say, that it ill becomes the limited understanding of a creature, who is totally at a loss how to explain that intimate union of body and soul in his own person, which renders him, what he feels himself to be, a single individual, to pronounce dogmatically what may or may not be true of Him, the Ancient of days; of that mysterious, that ineffable Spirit, whose essence fills all possible extension of space, all infinite duration of time.

In attempting to be wise beyond what hath been revealed, and weighing in the scale of human conjecture mysteries which perhaps superior beings tremble whilst they contemplate, let the Trinitarian believer, on the one hand, take heed that he loses not himself in the labyrinth of his own speculations, however well intended, and begin to venerate as dogmas of faith the phantoms of his own perplexed imagination. He who should occupy himself in gazing upon the sun, in the hope of detecting the laws by which it exists, would probably destroy the faculty of sight, for the use of which that great luminary was created: but he would indeed be a madman, should he announce the discolored and distorted visions floating before his dazzled organs of perception, as new and important discoveries in science. The men of Bethshemeth, we are told, were struck dead for looking irreverently into the ark of God: and if at present he is graciously pleased to visit our follies less severely, we may at least infer, from the strange aberrations into which he has allowed those to run who have presumptuously attempted to explain the ineffable mysteries of his nature, that such speculations are neither pleasing to him, nor beneficial to ourselves.
—Bishop Skuttleworth.

THE CHRISTIAN AND THE WORLDLING.—Here is a religious man sitting under his vine, or under his fig-tree, viewing the prosperity which God hath given him, in the returns of husbandry or of commerce. Yonder a worldly man is similarly situated. The breast of one swells with high devotion in surveying the scene around him, the love of God glows in his heart, the hope of heaven beams in his elevated eye. While his herds feed around, or the winds waft home in safety the fruits of his successful adventures, he is conscious of something like him, which chastens and exalts the satisfaction that naturally flows from issues of prosperous life. The world has no sentiments but such as are connected with things present. In the gains and glories of time he sees all his portion, nor rise his sentiments above it. In this case, who does not see that to the possession of the present good, piety superadds its peculiar joys? And, therefore, in their common prosperity, the religious and the irreligious man are very unequal in point of true, heart-felt and reasonable enjoyment. Both have the pleasures of taste and the gladness of prosperity, but what an exquisite relish is added to this taste and to that gladness by the exalted sentiments of devotion! Next view them in privation.—Some sad reverse occurs, and both are left in poverty and destitution. The shock is, perhaps, too great for worldly fortitude to stand, and if not overwhelmed in despair, yet happiness is confessedly gone. The believer, however, from his rock of salvation, sees flocks and herds, and possessions laid waste, and turns him to rejoice in the Lord and joy in the hope of a more enduring substance. Contrast them, then, in privation, and shall any one be at a loss to determine whose spirit is the noblest, and whose sentiments are the most connected with joy, and who is the most secure against the reverses of time?—Sieveright.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

A FEARFUL GIFT.—It is our moral agency. It is a gift connected with responsibilities and perils of momentuous import. It implies freedom of action—the liability of doing wrong, and of incurring its penalty. It gives the power to act, or to refuse to act—to accept or reject—to believe and be saved if we will, and to disbelieve and be lost, if we prefer. Blessing and cursing are equally at our option. There is no compulsion to force us to believe and live. God has thrown the entire responsibility of the amazing issue upon each one, and gifted each with the awful privilege of destroying his own soul if he will. He has not placed us in the world to be indifferent to our own condition, or thrust us into being to stand by as idle spectators of an Almighty and arbitrary disposition of our destiny. God regards us as free. He neither compels us to act or believe. The means and the inducements he gives us in abundance; but if we prefer to neglect and disregard them, he does not step in to prevent the choice, nor to avert the consequence.

There is no impossibility of being lost. Every sinner has the fatal power. There is not an arm in the universe that shall wrest from him the weapons of spiritual suicide. Rather than destroy his freedom, God will suffer him to toss upon the surges of fire forever. With him, and none else for him, abides the choice. If he will have it so, the bitter cup must be drunk, and the worm endured. Before him, and none else for him, is laid the tremendous alternative. He, and he alone, shall pick out his eternal residence, and choose his everlasting companionship. He, and he alone, shall decide whether heaven or hell be the portion of his soul. How fearful the prerogative! How unspeakable the results of its exercise! Heirship of destiny—choice of eternities—decision of deathless interests! What a thing to be a moral agent! Who should not tremble beneath the weight of its responsibility? To whom should it be a matter of indifference, when such fearful consequences abide the result? W. W.

THE BIBLE.—There are only about fifty copies among the Nestorians, and these are in an unknown tongue. But they are cherished with the utmost affection. One copy, said to be 1500 years old, was regarded by Mr. Perkins as so interesting an object, that he solicited the loan of it to bring to this country; but the possessor refused to let it go, lest some dreadful calamity should fall upon the village.

THE WEEK.

The week is not marked out to us by the sun or moon, or any of the lights of heaven; but by the creation of God at the beginning, as it is told us in the 1st chapter of Genesis, where we read of the works of each of the first six days, and the rest of the seventh day.

The names of the days of the week as we have them now, are taken from some of the old heathen gods, chiefly of those that were worshipped here in England—as Wednesday is taken from the name of Woden, and Thursday of Thor. Even the heathens, who had lost the history of the creation, kept the division of time by weeks, and many things which they believed concerning their gods, shewed a faint recollection of the great truths which were made known at the beginning of the world, or showed how they were still feeling after the truth, and getting hold of it here and there. To us the days of the week may each in its turn bring a lesson of instruction, some of them a double lesson.

We may think of them first as recalling the works which God did on each day.

On Sunday He made the light.

On Monday the firmament.

On Tuesday He parted the dry land from the sea, and made it bring forth trees and herbs.

On Wednesday He made the sun, moon, and stars.

On Thursday the birds and fishes.

On Friday beast and man.

On Saturday He rested from all His work that He had made.

We may readily think of some passages of the Bible suited to these several days:

For Sunday. "With Thee is the well of life, and in thy light shall we see light." (Ps. xxxvi. 9.)

Monday. "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the hosts of them by the breath of His mouth. He gathereth the waters of the sea together, as it were upon an heap, and layeth up the deep as in a treasure-house." (Ps. xxxiii. 6, 7.)

Tuesday. "Who covereth the heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass grow upon the mountains, and herbs for the use of men." (Ps. cxlvii. 8.)

Wednesday. "Praise Him, sun and moon; praise Him, all ye stars of light." (Ps. cxlviii. 2.)

Thursday. "So is the great and wide sea also, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts." (Ps. civ. 25.) "Beside them shall the fowls of the air have their habitation, and sing among the branches." (Ps. civ. 11.)

Friday. "The lions, roaring after their prey, do seek their meat from God." (Ps. civ. 21.) "My bones are not hid from Thee; though I be made secretly, and fashioned beneath in the earth." (Ps. cxxxix. 14.)

Saturday. "It is a people that do err in their hearts; for they have not known my ways; unto whom I sware in my wrath, that they should not enter into my rest." (Ps. xcv. 10, 11.)—By all the visible things (that is, the things which are seen,) that God made, He teaches us about invisible things, the things we cannot see.

Sunday. "The Lord is my light and my salvation." (Ps. xxvii. 1.)

Monday. "Look how high the heaven is in comparison of the earth; so great is His mercy also toward them that fear Him."—(Ps. ciii. 11.)

Tuesday. "He shall be like a tree planted by the water-side, that shall bring forth his fruit in due season." (Ps. 1. 3.)

Wednesday. "If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, that there should not be day and night in their season, then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant." (Jer. xxxiii.) 20, 21.)

Thursday. "Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" (Matt. ii. 26.)

Friday. "Present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." (Rom. xii. 1.)

Saturday. "Let us, therefore, fear; lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to fall short of it." (Heb. iv. 1.)

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, June 15, 1842.

The Sabbath-day.

We are gratified to observe that the Central Association have adopted a Resolution enjoining it as a duty upon those who profess to observe the Sabbath of the commandment, to "Remember the Sabbath-day to KEEP IT HOLY." There exists throughout our denomination, to an alarming extent, too much of a spirit of indifference on this subject. Professing, as we do, to love the truths of the Bible, and to stand up in defense of the only Bible Sabbath, it is preeminently important that our practice should comport with our profession; and, that, above all, we should not trample under foot God's holy Sabbath. It is not a trifling thing in the eyes of those around us, that we are known to be loose in our practices on the Sabbath, neglecting public worship, and disregarding all the requirements of God upon us, while we are attending to our wordly affairs with a scrupulousness worthy of a better cause. Nor is it in the sight of God a thing of trifling moment for us to secularize that day, in its weekly returns, concerning which HE has spoken so emphatically, "IN IT THOU SHALT NOT DO ANY WORK." Hence, as President Wayland remarks, the law of the Sabbath forbids,—

1. All labor of body or mind, of which the immediate object is not the worship of God, or our own religious improvement.—The only exceptions to this rule, are works of necessity or of mercy. The necessity, however, must be one which is imposed by the providence of God, and not by our own will.

2. The pursuit of pleasure, or of any animal, or merely intellectual gratification.

3. The labor of those committed to our charge.

On the contrary, the law of the Sabbath enjoins the employment of the day in the more solemn and immediate duties of religion.

1. Reading the Scriptures, religious meditation, prayer in private, and also the special instruction in religion of those committed to our charge. And, hence, it enjoins such domestic arrangements as are consistent with these duties.

2. Social worship. Under the Mosaic and Christian dispensation, this was an important part of the duties of the day. As the setting apart of a particular day to be universally observed, involves the idea of social as well as personal religion, one of the most obvious duties which it imposes, is that of social worship; that is, of meeting together in societies, to return thanks for our social mercies, to implore the pardon of God for our social sins, and beseech His favor for those blessings which we need as societies, no less than as individuals.

The importance of the religious observance of the Sabbath, is seldom sufficiently estimated. Every attentive observer has remarked, that the violation of this command, by the young, is one of the most decided marks of incipient moral degeneracy. Religious restraint is fast losing its hold upon that young man, who, having been educated in the fear of God, begins to spend the Sabbath in idleness, or in amusement.

And also, we have examples in the life and practice of Christ and the Apostles, as to the manner in which the Sabbath was to be kept. The conscience has been lulled into a state of carelessness on this subject which is deplorable in the extreme, and reflects no little discredit upon us as a people. We trust that every friend to the Sabbath will be strenuously careful to not secularize its sacred hours in a manner that shall bring a disgrace upon the cause, and ruin to their own souls.

Old Tomb-Stones—Early History.

DOCT. W. M. FAHNESTOCK has furnished us with a valuable paper in relation to the "Old Tomb-Stones," and the early history of our denomination in Pennsylvania, which we lay before our readers with pleasure. But we wish to say, in advance, that, although the MS. is very beautiful and plain, errors may be noticed by Dr. F., particularly in the names of persons and places, as they are not so easily detected in such.

The Season.

The season, thus far, has been very backward and unpromising; and, to cap the climax, we have had three or four such frosts within a few days past as has rarely been witnessed in De Ruyter, even, at this season of the year. On Sabbath morning our hills were covered with snow; and again, on first day morning, (12th inst.,) another severe frost, producing ice half an inch in thickness, completed the destruction of fruit, corn, garden vegetables, and very likely Spring Wheat has suffered much.

United States' Insurance Company.

About the first of February last, we received a Circular from Mr. BENJAMIN BALCH, 34 Wall-st., New-York, requesting us to advertise a notice of half a column, for the U. S. Insurance Company, and forward the Bill to him, as above, which would be promptly paid. We did so, and forwarded a Bill of $15, and on diligent inquiry by a gentleman in New-York, no such man is to be found in the city.

As we have noticed that several of the Marine Insurance Companies are "winding up" their affairs, it is possible this is among the list, and Mr. Balch has taken up his residence elsewhere. If any of our friends can give us any information as to his residence, they will confer a favor by so doing.

The Temperance Cause.

Notwithstanding very much good has been accomplished since the great Temperance effort commenced in this town, there yet remains much to be done. Every friend of the Temperance cause has a deep and an abiding interest in its final triumph over drunkenness, misery and crime; and every one can find a field yet broad enough in which to labor for the amelioration of mankind. Is it not enough that some of our most enterprizing and valued citizens have, in years gone by, been hurried to a drunkard's grave? Is it not enough that anguish indescribable has riven the fond heart of a wife or a mother, in consequence of intemperance? And must there still be other men taken from our social circles, to follow in the wake of those whose sun has set in darkness? In view of all these considerations we repeat, there is much for every Washingtonian to do in this vicinity; and when we connect with these the fact, that we have no less than four "licensed" groggeries to one Temperance House, in a village like this, where some six hundred have attached their names to the pledge of the American Temperance Union, the case need not be plainer that strenuous and untiring efforts are yet requisite, in order that the unfortunate may be preserved from the intoxicating and demoralizing influences with which they now find themselves surrounded. Nor, indeed, is it strange that there are those who have made loud and heart-stirring professions of attachment to the Temperance cause here in its early stages, and have advocated the cause with much of eloquence and apparent zeal, who, in an uaguarded moment, should have suffered from the surrounding influences, and again returned to his "cups." We say this is not strange.—But it reminds us more and more of our deep obligations, as the friends of the drunkard, to cast around him a protecting arm, nor suffer him to be made the unwilling dupe of the heartless rumseller, who must be void of all moral principle to continue in the traffic against the wishes of nine-tenths of the citizens of the community. Let the true friends of Temperance stand firm to their principles, and resolve themselves into a "Standing Committee of the Whole," to reclaim those who have violated their pledge, and protect each other from the unsavory influences which have been thrown amongst us, like the blighting Sirocco, and still more deadly, by a recent act of our Board of Excise. Early English Seventh-Day Baptists of Pennsylvania.

MR. EDITOR:—The "Register" of the 1st inst. contains an enquiry, in an editorial reference to the article on "Old Tomb Stones" from the "Presbyterian," whether there existed a society of Seventh-Day Baptists in Pennsylvania so early as 1702; and as you are in error in supposing there were not any at that period, and as you are preparing for publication a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination, I take pleasure in apprizing you that there were several Seventh-Day Baptist Churches established prior to that time in Pennsylvania; originating in a division of "Keithian Baptists," who separated from the Quakers and became Baptists.

I even find the name of REES PRICE, (one of those whose tombs have attracted attention,) enrolled as a Keithian Baptist; and as Bristol township, where the tombs were found, adjoins Oxford township, where a Seventh-Day Society was in existence, it is fairly to be presumed that he attached himself to it, as many of the Keithian Baptists did.

We have some strong circumstantial evidence of the existence of a Seventh-Day Baptist Society in the State of Pennsylvania, before the secession of a portion of the Keithian Baptists and their embracing the Sabbath of the Lord. By a deed of Indenture a lot of ground was demised, by a Seventh-Day Baptist, about or before the year 1790, (as well as my recollection will serve me, my memoranda on these subjects having become so much deranged and mislaid by my removal from Ephrata to this place, a few years since, that I cannot lay my hands on them to refresh my memory as to the exact time, and be correct in the name of the devisor;) in the city of Philadelphia, as a burying ground for the Seventh-Day Baptist Society, in which several have been interred, time out of mind to the oldest citizens: and which lot has recently been ceded to the city of Philadelphia, by compromise. Stephen Girard having made a nominal purchase of it from the New Jersey Seventh-Day Baptists, an ejectment was entered by the society at Ephrata, who thought it was their duty to protect the domain of the dead; but wearied out by the uncongenial perplexities of the law, and the repulsive contentions of litigation, yielded it amicably to the city: and now buildings are erected upon it for the Girard Trust. By and by I may be able to give you more correct information on this subject; and for the present will transcribe, for the gratification of your readers, an account of the origin of the Keithian Baptists, and the early Seventh-Day Baptists of that State, from Morgan Edwards' Materials towards a History of the American Baptists, published at Philadelphia in 1770.

Conrad Beissel whom you suppose emigrated to America with John and Rees Price, did not arrive until 1720. The same reason which prevents me from giving you precise information on the subject just alluded to above, also deprives me from adding, in full, the singular inscription on the tomb stone of Beissel, which is a large flat stone, and which is very much calculated to impress the mind solemnly and profitably. After giving his name and monastic title, the period of his birth and time of his death, quaintly adds:—

AGED 52 YEARS.

And then below, in small letters,

(NATURAL LIFE 77 YEARS.)

Implying that the fifty-two years he lived to the Lord were only worthy of being noted—the other 25 years devoted to the world were lost entirely—of no account.

With these remarks I proceed to transcribe the brief account of the early Seventh-Day Churches in Pennsylvania by Morgan Edwards; promising you any other information I may be able to obtain on the subject in time for your History.

Yours, fraternally,
WM. M. FAHNESTOCK.

The Keithian Baptists.

Soon after the settlement of Pennsylvania a difference arose among the Quakers touching, The sufficiency of what every man naturally has within himself for the purpose of his own salvation. Some denied that sufficiency, and, consequently, magnified the external Word, Christ, &c. above Barclay's measure. These were headed by the famous George Keith, and therefore called Keithians. The difference rose to a division in the year 1691, when separate meetings were set up in diverse parts of the country, and a general one at Burlington in opposition to that of Philadelphia. This year they published a Confession of faith, containing twelve articles much in Barclay's strain, and signed by George Keith, Thomas Budd, John Hart, Richard Hilliard, Thomas Hooten, and Henry Furness in behalf of the rest. They also published, "The reasons of the separation, &c." signed by the same persons and others to the number 48. About the same time, and afterward, were published several other pieces. The design of these publications was

1. To inform the world of the principles of the separate Quakers.

2. To fix the blame of the separation on the opposite party; and

3. To complain of the unfair treatment, slanders, fines, imprisonment, and other species of persecution which they endured from their brethren.

* * * * *

However, the Keithian Quakers soon declined; their head deserted them and went over to the Episcopalians. Some followed him thither. Some returned to the Penn Quakers, and some went to other societies. Nevertheless many persisted in the separation, particularly in Upper Providence; at Philadelphia; at Southampton; and at Lower Dublin. These by resigning themselves to the guidance of Scripture began to find water in the commission; (a) bread and wine in the command; (b) community of goods, love feast, kiss of charity, right hand of fellowship, annointing the sick for recovery, and washing of the disciples feet in other tents; (c) and therefore were determined to practice accordingly. The society of Keithian's most forward in these matters was that kept at the house of Thomas Powell in Upper Providence; which forwardness it was said, was owing to one Abel Noble who visited them, and was a Seventh-Day Baptist minister when he arrived in this country (1684.) The time when they began to put their design in practice, was June 28, 1787, when the said Abel Noble baptized a public Friend, (whose name was Thomas Martin,) in Redley creek. Afterwards Martin baptized other Quakers, viz: Thomas Powell, Evan Hany, Hugh Hany, John Palmer, Judith Calvat, Alce Vestal, Thomas Budd, Richard Dungworth, John Powell, David Thomas, John Hannum, Margery Hannum, Margery Martin, Mary Palmer, Elizabeth Powell, John Beckingham. To them joined one William Beckingham, who broke off from the church of Cohansey.—Here 19 persons did, October 12, 1697, incorporate, and proceed to choose a minister by lot. Three were put in nomination, William Beckingham, Thomas Budd, and Thomas Martin; the lot fell on the last, who the same day administered the Lord's supper to them for the first time. From that time forth other Keithian Quakers were baptized, Ann Compton, Samuel Miles, Hannah Brunssun, William Thomas, Richard Buffington, Elizabeth Thomas, Jane Phillips, Edward Lane, Edward Edwards, James Plumley, David Phillips, Elizabeth Pavia, Mary Clark, Elizabeth Hall, Rees Price, &c., some of which lived in other parts of the country. But in 1700 a difference arose among them touching the Sabbath and broke up the society. Such as adhered to the observation of the seventh-day kept together at Newtown, where some of their posterity are to this day.

Another society of Keithian Quakers who kept together was that of Philadelphia, where they builded a meeting house in 1692. Of these, two public persons were baptized in 1697 by Rev. Thomas Killingworth of Cohansey. Their names were William Davis, and Thomas Rutter. The first joined Pennepek; the other kept preaching in Philadelphia, where he baptized one Henry Bernard Korta, Thomas Peart, and seven others. They increased and continued 9 years together, and then united with the regular Baptists.

A third society of Keithian Quakers was at Southampton, in Bucks county, kept at the house of one John Swift. Their preacher was John Hart. In 1697 said John Hart, John Swift, Evan Morgan, and others were baptized by the aforementioned Mr. Thomas Rutter. Evan Morgan joined Pennepek the same year; the rest kept together to 1702, and then followed the steps of Evan Morgan.

The other society of Keithian Quakers was that in Lower Dublin township, kept at the house of Abraham Pratt. One of these, John Wells, became a Baptist, Sept. 27, 1697. In the year 1699, and afterwards, others were baptized, as David Price and wife, Abraham Pratt and wife, Richard Wansett, Margaret Davis, Martha Deal, Peter Deal, Richard Wells, Richard Sparks, Nicholas Ashmead, Alexander Babcock, &c. These united in communion after the manner of their brethren at Upper Providence, having William Davis to their minister. But they had not long been a society before the same question divided them, as in Chester county. Those who preferred the seventh-day were William Davis, their preacher, the Wells; the Wansetts; the Pratts; the Ashmeads, &c. These went by themselves, and in 1702 built a place of worship in Oxford township. But their preacher leaving them in 1711, and their meeting house being taken from them, they became as sheep without a shepherd. Those who adhered to the first-day joined Pennepek.

Thus it will be seen that the Keithian Quakers ended in a kind of transformation into Keithian Baptists; they were also called Quaker Baptists, because they still retained the language, dress, and manners of Quakers. We have also seen that the Keithian or Quaker Baptists ended in another kind of transformation into Seventh-Day Baptists, though some went away among the First-Day Baptists, and other societies. However, these were the beginning of the Sabbatarians in this province.

The Seventh-Day Baptists.

These, it is well known, receive their distinction from the day of the week they observe for holy rest. The characters of general and particular divide them in this province, few as they are. They originated from the Keithian Baptists in 1700, as has been observed before, who were general in their sentiments touching the redemption of Christ. Before that time I can find but one Seventh-Day Baptist in Pennsylvania, viz: Mr. Abel Noble. He arrived, it is said, in the year 1684. His name is among the forty-eight who signed the reasons of the Keithian separation in 1691. By him was the first Keithian baptized in 1697, and by him were the rest gained over to the observance of the Seventh-Day. I suppose, therefore, he may be called the father of them in this part of America. The congregation of German Baptists at Tunkerstown, who observe the Seventh-Day, owe their peculiarities in that point to this man. But more of these hereafter: at present we have only to do with the British Seventh-Day Baptists.—Of these there be four societies in the province.

The first society we shall mention is that at Newtown in Upper Providence, Chester County, about 24 miles W. b S. from Philadelphia. The meeting is kept at the house of David Thomas. Three families belong to this place, whereof the following persons are baptized, David Thomas, John German, Hazarl Thomas, Ruth Thomas, Priscilla Wane, Elizabeth Wane, Mary Gilky. This was their state in 1770. They originated in 1700; but their ministers, Messieurs Martin, Beckingham and Budd, dying, and none rising in their stead, they are reduced to a small handful.

The next society of them is at Pennepek, in Lower Dublin, county of Philadelphia, about 9 miles from the city. The meeting is held at the house of Benjamin Tomlinson, every second Sabbath, by Mr. Enoch David. The families belonging to this society are eleven, whereof the following persons are baptized: Samuel Wells, Richard Tomlinson and wife, Job Noble and wife, Elizabeth West, Mary Keen, Rebecka Dungan, Enoch David. This was the state in 1770. They originated in 1701. But their ministers, William Davis and Thomas Rutter quitting them, and none other rising in their stead, they are reduced at present to 9 souls. In the year 1702 they built a meeting house on a lot given them by Thomas Graves; but they neglecting to take a conveyance in due time, the Episcopalians have got both house and lot. On the lot they have built Oxford church, and have turned the Baptist meeting house into a stable while it stood; but now it is no more.

The third society is at Nottingham, in Chester county, about 50 miles from Philadelphia. The meeting is sometimes kept at the house of Abigail Price in said Nottingham, but chiefly at the house of Samuel Bond, in Cecil county, in the province of Maryland. The families to which Nottingham is central are six; eight persons whereof are baptized, viz: Daniel Osborn, Joseph Osborn, Samuel Bond, Richard Bond, Richard Clayton, Abigail Price, Ann Bond, Mary Bond. Here a yearly meeting is kept on the last Sabbath in August. This was their state in 1770.

The other society of them are at French Creek, in East Natmeat township, Chester county, about 32 miles from Philadelphia. Here is a meeting house, 30 feet by 22, built in 1762, on a lot of one acre, the gift of David Rogers. The families belonging to this place are six; whereof ten persons are baptized, Philip Thomas, Gwen Griffiths, David Rogers, Abel Griffiths, James Roberts, William Griffiths, Daniel Griffiths, Owen Hughs, Edward Hughs, and Ann Hughs. They have no stated worship in this house, though it be the only one belonging to the Sabbatarians. This was their state in 1770. They originated in the year 1726, when the following persons broke off from the Great Valley Church, (First-Day Baptist,) on account of their change of sentiment concerning the Sabbath, Philip Davis, Lewis Williams, Richard Edwards, Griffy Griffiths; and the next year William James. These five with their families removed to French Creek in the aforesaid year. Philip Davis and Lewis Williams did preach among them, and after them John Brayman; but for some time past they have been as sheep without a shepherd.

Thus have we seen

1. That there are in Pennsylvania, (1770,) of the Seventh-Day Baptists, (British,) 26 families, containing 130 souls, allowing 5 to a family; whereof 31 are baptized.

2. That they originated from the Keithian Baptists about the year 1700, by means of Abel Noble.

3. That they have, two yearly meetings, and one meeting house. To which we may add, that they have one minister, Enoch David.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

Destruction of Hamburg by fire—Railroad accident in France—Another attempt upon the life of Louis Phillippe—Earthquake in Greece.

The steamer Columbia arrived at Boston on the 2d inst., and the Great Western at New York on the 4th—the latter having made her voyage in less than 14 days, the shortest homeward passage ever made from Liverpool.

The intelligence brought is of the most melancholy character. The city of Hamburgh, the great commercial emporium of Germany, one of the Hanseatic towns, has been almost utterly destroyed by fire. The conflagration commenced on the 14th of May, and there is every reason for supposing it to have been the work of an incendiary. The fire raged beyond all control, from Wednesday night till Saturday morning. The fire broke out in Deich Strasse, a somewhat narrow street approaching the Elbe, and traveled in a northeasterly direction, destroying in its progress nearly one-third of the whole city, and that by far the most valuable and important part, in a business point of view. It is calculated that upwards of two thousand houses have been burned. More than thirty thousand persons out of a population of 150,000, have been rendered houseless. Two splendid churches, with steeples 400 feet high, and the old Exchange are among the ruins. No one can tell the number of lives lost, but a great number are known to have perished. The whole extent of property destroyed is estimated at £7,000,000, of which the houses constitute £3,000,000.

It affords some relief of the sad history to know that immediate and generous efforts have been made at several places for the relief of the sufferers. The amounts subscribed already to the funds of this charity, are as follows:

By his Majesty the King of Prussia, about,	£7,500
The city of Berlin,	1,500
The King of Denmark,	7,500
The Duke of Mechlenburg Schwerin,	2,300
States of Hanover,	15,000
City of Frankfort,	8,500
City of Bremen,	5,000

In England responses have been made with characteristic promptitude and liberality. In New York a meeting of German emigrants was held for the relief of their suffering fellow countrymen. The destruction of Hamburg is one of those calamities which will be felt in every part of the commercial world. Great as may be the credit of the Senate and people of Hamburg with foreign States, a century will elapse before the city can be replaced in all the prosperity destroyed by this conflagration. In the midst of the confusion an incident occurred characteristic of the government and the people. A public notice was every where put up, stating that the vaults under the bank, containing the gold and silver bars, were fire proof, and that the bank books were all removed in perfect safety.

Terrible Railroad Accident.

A deplorable catastrophe took place on Sunday evening, May 8th, on the Versailles and Mendon Railway, by which 120 persons were killed, or have since died of their wounds, and many maimed and wounded. In honor of the King's fete the waterworks in the gardens of Versailles were playing on Sunday, which attracted immense crowds from Paris. The train to which the dreadful accident occurred left Versailles for Paris at half past 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and was crowded with passengers.

"There were," says one account, "17 or 18 wagons, with two engines before and one behind. The velocity was excessive. When between Bellevue and Mendon the axle-tree of the first machine broke, and, stopping, the second ran over it, killing the stoker and breaking the first machine, and spilt its fire on the ground. Instantly six or seven wagons were broken in pieces, and the rest running over the live fire of the broken engines, burst into flames. It is customary on the Left Bank Railroad for the doors of the wagons to be closed, without any possibility of opening them, except by keys, in the hands of the conductors. No conductors were forthcoming, and thus the inmates of three wagons were burned!"

Among the dead were Admiral Dumont D'Urville, his wife and son. The body of the Admiral was found in a frightful state—so burnt that it was recognized only by comparison of the skull with casts that had been taken during life. The remains of Madame D'Urville also had been identified.

M. Guizot, the Minister, was among the travelers on the road, at the moment of the accident, but he was in another train, going from Paris to Versailles.

Many persons of distinction escaped by being a moment too late, or by finding the train full. The King's youngest son, the Duke de Montpensier, came by it a short distance from Versailles, and then got out. M. Chambolles, (a Deputy and Editor in chief of the Siecle,) was on the point of entering with his three sons, when a friend offered him seats in his carriage, which he accepted.

Mr. Henry Bulwer arrived at the station before the train started, but could not obtain a place. A son of Colonel Thorne, an American, who was said to have been one of the victims, had attempted to obtain a place in the train but failed. Several other incidents of the kind are mentioned.

The moment the King was informed of this sad event, his Majesty ordered the Chateau of Mendon to be opened for the accommodation of the wounded, and directed that every care should be taken of them, and that every necessary should be placed at their disposal. An Aid-de-Camp of the King, despatched in all haste to Mendon, saw his Majesty's orders carried into execution.

The locomotives were made in England, and had been obtained from that country especially for the sake of excellence and safety.

Another Attempt to Assassinate the King of France.—A conspiracy of low persons to assassinate Louis Phillippe has been detected, and several persons have been arrested, among whom is the notorious Considere, twice before implicated in similar plots, but acquitted for want of evidence. The deed was to have been effected by projectiles, to be thrown at the King, when riding for pleasure with other members of his family. This plot was so laid as to have excited a great degree of alarm at the narrow escape which the King made.

Earthquake in Greece.—Letters from Athens of the 28th ult. state, that several violent shocks of an earthquake were felt in various parts of the Peloponnesus; on the 18th, at Sparta, the shocks lasted from 25 to 30 seconds each. The inhabitants ran terrified out of their houses. On the same day, and in the course of the night, four or five other slighter shocks were experienced. Beyond the Eurotas an immense rock fell from Mount Menelas, near the village of Drouchas. An old tower situated in the town of Magoules was thrown to the ground. At Mistra the soil trembled with more violence than at Sparta, and a portion of the Hellenic College and several houses were destroyed. The water of the springs and wells became turbid, and an enormous rock having detached itself from the summit of old Mount Mistra, rolled with terrific noise into the town.

At Calmet the first shock, felt at half-past 9 o'clock, lasted between 40 and 50 seconds, and there were ten others, from that hour until midnight, at intervals of three-quarters of an hour. Most of the houses were damaged, and several in the neighborhood actually gave way. Upwards of 50 dwellings were thrown down at Areopolis, and 15 towers crumbled at Œtylus. Many persons were buried under the ruins of their houses in the province of Maina. At Androusa several churches fell in. On the 25th ult., at about 4 o'clock A. M., another shock was felt at Patras, which lasted a minute and a half.

Mr. Cass, American Minister at Paris, has published a protest against the ratification on the part of the French government of the treaty with England and the other powers, for the suppression of the slave trade. It is very generally thrown out in Paris, that in making all this bluster, the minister is only serving as a catspaw in the hands of M. Thiers in his opposition to the existing government.

The parliamentary news is unimportant. Sir Robert Peel's income tax bill is slowly passing through the house. He has introduced his tariff bill, which will be the next matter of importance. The efforts of Mr. Roebuck to expose the election frauds, were exciting great interest and feeling.

A strong feeling is daily extending throughout England against the Affghan and China wars. George Thomson is earnestly engaged in lecturing against them.

A vigorous society has been formed at Birmingham, to operate on the public mind in reference to universal suffrage, called the Complete Suffrage Union. Joseph Sturge is the chairman, and auxiliaries are forming in all parts of the kingdom. Quite a large number of intelligent lecturers are employed. The Union have already memorialized Parliament.

Joseph Sturge, the well known philanthropist, is the whig candidate for Parliament from Nottingham district, which is vacant on account of the bribery at the late election. As he unites all the anti-tory interest, his election is quite certain. He had, as yet, no opponent.

There was a terrible explosion of a distillery, in Church street, Lambeth, on the 13th, but a short distance from the palace of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Several persons were injured. A column of ignited spirit was thrown upwards of fifty feet into the air.

A successful experiment had been made in London, by several distinguished physicians, in removing a cataract from the eye by means of galvanism. The subject created a good deal of interest.

A great fire is announced to have befallen the Austrian town Steijer, not far from Lintz, where 400 houses were consumed and three-fourths of the inhabitants, who were celebrated for their iron manufactures, were left without shelter.

The London papers contain full accounts of the anniversaries of the great British benevolent societies, which appear to have been unusually interesting.

There exists in some parts of Germany, a law to prevent drinking during divine service on Sunday. It runs thus:—"Any person drinking in an ale-house during divine service on Sunday, or other holiday, may legally depart without paying."

News of the Day.

The last census shows that there are $6,089,971 of capital invested in this country in the manufacture of cabinet ware. Articles to over $14,000,000 in value were made in 1840. The business gives employment to 18,000, and support to 72,000 souls.

It is stated that there are at least 2,000 mechanics out of work in Philadelphia, 3,000 in New York, 1,000 in Boston, and 1,500 in Baltimore, and in the United States not far from 20,000 persons! What is to be the end of this distress?

The steamboat Troy ran up to Albany on Tuesday in 8h. 48m., including thirteen stoppages.

A farmer in Plymouth, Michigan, has sold $500 worth of clover-seed, of his own raising of last year's crop. The exports of grass seed in that State, of the produce of the last year, is near 1,000 casks.

A tavern keeper at South Natick, Mass., a few days since cut down the venerable oak beneath which John Elliot, the celebrated "apostle to the Indians," used to gather his "praying red men," one hundred and ninety years ago.

Accounts from Missouri, state that Gov. Boggs is rapidly recovering.

The Virginia Legislature elect is thus composed: In the House, 50 Whigs, and 84 Opposition—opposition majority in the House, 34. In the Senate, oppo. 20, 8 Whigs.

It is stated in the Worcester (Mass.) Palladium, that a requisition was made upon Gov. Davis, on Saturday, by the Constitutionalists in Rhode Island, for Mr. De Wolfe of Uxbridge; and that the Governor at once granted the request.

The Palmyra (Mo.) Courier says the rumor that Jo Smith the Mormon Prophet, had been killed in an affray near Nauvoo by one of his fanatical followers, is not true. Jo Smith, it appears, quarreled with one of his followers about the amount of tithes the latter should pay for the use of the prophet. The result was, Jo Smith received a severe cowhiding.

A Rochester paper says that the notorious Mr. Van Zandt is officiating at Seneca Falls.

The mystery of the pocket book recently found in a stone fence at Norwich, has been removed. Mr. Bond, the owner, was robbed of it on board the steamer from New York to Norwich in June, 1840. He is still in business at Macon, Georgia.

Four slaves, a father and his three sons, arrived at Gerrit Smith's, in Peterboro, in this State, a few days since, on their way from Washington county, Md., (where they were owned,) to Canada, which place they have probably reached ere this.

Governor Dorr.—A requisition has been made on the Governors of Massachusetts, Connecticut and New York, for the surrender of Mr. Dorr, should he appear in either of these States. Dorr is probably in Connecticut. The last accounts of him were that he was at Thompson in that State—but what doing nobody seems to know.

Retrenchment.—Hon. John C Spencer has Just issued a General Order, cutting off the allowances of "Extra Rations" hitherto made to various officers of the Army, on the ground of being constructively in command of posts. The allowance was first made only to each officer actually in command of a post, but grown into a flagrant abuse, by the correction of which the Secretary of War will save the country many thoasands per annum.

The Baptist Register tells a good thing: A loafing vagabond called at a house in a neighboring town one Sunday, and begged for some cider. The lady refused to give him any, and he reminded her of the often quoted remark, that she might "entertain an angel unawares." "Yes," replied she, "but angels don't go about drinking cider on Sundays."

Banks.—In the late number of Sylvester's Counterfeit Detector, we find the list of the names of upwards of 1200 banks in the United States. Upon a careful examination, we find that of the 1200, upwards of three hundred are broken; sixty-four are fraudulent institutions; forty-four are either closed or closing; fifty-five are at a discount of from 25 to 90 per cent; sixty-two are from 2 to 20 per cent discount; and but 52 are at par, or worth 100 cents on the dollar, in the city of New York. The same paper also cotains a list of over 900 different counterfeits on various banking institutions in the Union.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

The Seventh-Day Baptist Central Association, convened at Brookfield, to the Churches they represent:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—Having been permitted by our ever merciful Father to assemble in another Anniversary, we wish first to record our gratitude for the goodness and grace that have been extended to our body since our last assemblage, and during our present interview. Many tokens of the divine favor have been conferred, and the chastening hand has been light.—One of the watchmen on the walls of our beloved Zion has gone to his rest, and several of our Dear Brethren who have been our companions and helpers, have left the church militant for the church triumphant. These circumstances, with others that attend us, admonish us to have our work done, and well done.

Permit us, therefore, to call your attention to the subject of CHRISTIAN BENEVOLENCE, as having an important bearing on us as Christians. The essence of our holy religion is love, as it regards our relation to God and our fellows. Love to God calls for purity of heart and life. Love to our fellows calls for the exercise of expanded Christian benevolence. The Apostle James says, that "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and keep himself unspotted from the world." We may, therefore, judge that Christian benevolence is only the proof of the existence of pure and undefiled religion in the heart, or the carrying out in practice what we profess. The exercise of this principle is regulated principally by the perception and acknowledgment of Christian responsibilities and external circumstances in life. Wherever there exists a proper perception of the nature and tendencies of the gospel of Jesus Christ, it begets the true principle of benevolence, and prompts to every effort that can be devised to extend to all men the knowledge of salvation; and every consistent means will be employed to cultivate the self-denial that exhibited itself in the lives of primitive Christians, and had its perfection in the life and conduct of the Christian's great exemplar—Jesus Christ.

External circumstances govern in a great measure the exercise of Christian benevolence. A person of circumscribed means must necessarily be circumscribed in his benevolent operations. But if he properly appreciate his Christian responsibilities, his benevolence will manifest itself in such efforts to do good as he is able to make.—The true Christian finds ample room for his labors. If his pecuniary means forbid his contributing to sustain those who are commissioned to preach Christ and Him crucified, his benevolent feelings prompt him to use his own personal influence to persuade men to be reconciled to God, and also to contribute the aid of his fervent effectual prayers for the same purpose.

At this time, Christians are called upon to be faithful to the trust reposed in them by God. The truths of the Bible must be enforced and urged upon the consideration of men. Infidelity in some places is making fearful advances. Heresies are growing in the Church, and the unchangeable and unchanged commands of Jehovah are set at nought by those professing to teach the way of life. Such things call loudly upon Christians, by their love to God and his laws, by their obligations as Christians, by their anxiety for the purity and triumph of the church, and the salvation of souls, and by their own hope of acceptance with God, to awake to the exercise of Christian benevolence. God's truths must be enforced, and every species of infidelity, of heresy, and sin must be met and subdued, and this labor, Dear Brethren, belongs to you in connection with other saints of God. God has committed to his Church the means of carrying forward his work, and he has the first claim upon every Christian's efforts, and upon his mental, physical, and pecuniary abilities, as upon his constant influence. Says an Apostle, ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore, glorify God in your body, and in your spirit which are God's, and in another place exhorts by the mercies of God that they present their bodies a living sacrifice to God, holy and acceptable in his sight.

Brethren, cast your eyes over the broad field that is waiting for the harvest, and then as you regard your obligations as Christians, and laborers in God's vineyard, concentrate your efforts and let your influence be felt. Cry aloud and spare not, lift up your voice like a trumpet, and show the people of this world their transgressions, and professors of religion their sins. And when you have done what you can in the exercise of Christian benevolence, you may rest assured that the chariot of salvation and truth will roll gloriously on, and the savor of your influence will be constantly increasing, and of you will it be said, well done good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of thy Lord.

Notices.

NOTICE.

The S. D. Baptist Western Association will hold its next annual session with the church in Hayfield, Crawford Co., Pa., commencing on the 5th day of the week before the last Sabbath, (23d inst.,) at 10 o'clock A. M.

The Ministerial Conference of the Western Association will hold its session during the week of the Association, at the same place.

NOTICE.

The Schools of the town of De Ruyter will be visited as follows, viz:

June 15, Benjamin's, Clark's, and Burdick's Districts.

June 16, Esq. Barne's, Newitt's and Basin Districts.

June 17, Lewis's, and Village Districts.

The Inspectors, Trustees, and all who feel interested in our Schools—and who does not?—are respectfully invited to attend.

NOTICE.

S. D. DELLAY takes this method of informing his friends and old customers that he has removed his stock of Goods to the Store of H. A. & F. C. DELLAY, where he is now able to offer them better inducements for trade than he ever before has been, in terms of credit, prices, &c. &c. He would also say that he will be permanently there, and intends making De Ruyter a location for years in the mercantile business. He would further say that he has not failed as some of his friends have endeavored to convince the public. He will be glad to see his debtor as well as his creditor, being able and willing to satisfy each.

De Ruyter, March 28 1842. v3n5tf

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S. D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to the subscribers, to the funds of De Ruyter Institute, that the annual meeting of the stockholders will take place on Tuesday the 21st day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Institution, for the purpose of electing four trustees, to hold their office three years, in the place of Henry Crandall, Ira Spencer, Ephraim Arnold, and Willard D. Wilcox, whose term of office expires at that time, and to transact such other business as may be deemed necessary. JOHN R. BUTTS, Sec'y.
De Ruyter, April 27th, 1842.

MARRIED,

In Otselic, on the 9th inst., by the Rev. Wm Holeroyd, Mr. ISAAC LEVISEE, and Miss LURANSA HIGGINS, all of Otselic.

DIED,

In this village, on the 13th inst, FANNY, daughter of Elijah and Lurana C. Champlin, aged 4 years, of inflamation of the lungs, following the Scarlet Fever.

In De Ruyter, on the 9th inst, Mrs ELIZABETH WELLS, wife of Matthew Wells, in the 75th year of her age. She retired to rest in usual health, but was taken ill about half past 11 o'clock, and remained in great distress an hour and a quarter, when she expired.

Sister Wells made a profession of religion in the 18th year of her age, and united with the Seventh Day Baptist Church in Hopkinton R. I., where she held membership, until she united with the S. D. B. Church in De Ruyter of which she was a member when she died. She had many friends and relatives, among whom she sustained the christian character, and was an ornament to the religion she professed, being possessed of a meek and quiet spirit and beloved, as a consort, a sister and mother, not only literally, but also as a mother in Israel. A few moments before she fell asleep, she repeated an extract from the poet,

"O could I find from day to day,
A nearness to my God;
Then should my hours glide sweet away,
And live upon thy word." S. M. B.

In Otselic, on the 12th inst., Mrs. ELIZABETH LEVISEE, widow of Walter R. Levisee, after a protracted illness, aged 45 years. She has left six orphan children to mourn their irreparable loss.

Sister L. professed Christ in early life, and united with the Baptist Church in that place where she remained one of its firmest members until her death. As she had lived beloved of all, so is her death lamented by all who knew her.

Thus, since Jan. last, has been taken from one family, a son aged 12 years, the father in March last, and now the mother.

Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall. For in such a way as ye think not the Son of Man cometh. J. R. B.

In Friendship, on the 17th ult., Mr. WAIT CLARK, 67 years of age, after a short illness of about a week. He was born in R. I. where he made a public profession of faith in Christ, and became a conspicuous member of the S. D. Baptist Church in Hopkinton, he subsequently removed to Preston N. Y., thence to this town. He has left a widow and a number of children with a large circle of friends to mourn the loss. Brother Clark was blessed with more than an ordinary gift and for the last two or three years his daily life gave evidence that he was ripening for a glorious immortality. He frequently remarked to his friends that the hour of dissolution was not far distant and manifested a willingness to depart and be with Christ. Just previous to his departure he called his children, and warned them to be also ready. Retaining his reason, he died in the triumphs of faith. Z. C.

In Westerly, on the 8th of Feb., CLARK HISCOX, aged 81 years and some months. Brother Hiscox embraced religion in early life, and, having been a pillar in the church of God for more than half a century, he died in the full hope of a glorious immortality.

In Adams, on the ult., LYDIA, wife of Alvah G. Greene, and daughter of Dea. Elisha Crosby, in the 33d year of her age. Mrs. G. possessed an amiable disposition, which endeared her to all those who enjoyed her acquaintance; but the religion of Christ, which she embraced in her youth, gave lustre and finish to her character. She died as she had lived, in favor with God and the people. Her husband, a number of children, the Church, of which she was a valuable member, and her acquaintances generally, deplore that loss which to her is "gain." H. H. B.

In Adams, on the 29th ult., of a lingering illness which she bore with exemplary patience, Mrs. ESTHER, wife of Deacon David Maxson, aged about 52. Mrs M. became a hopeful subject of pardoning mercy, in early life, and has been for many years a worthy member of the Seventh Day Baptist Church. Her end was peaceful, as her life had been exemplary. Her hold on the affections of her friends was strong, and her loss will be sensibly felt by her numerous connections and acquaintances.

Truly in the midst of life, we are in death.

☞IMPORTANT WORK!

NOW IN THE COURSE OF PUBLICATION,

A DICTIONARY OF

Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Containing a clear exposition of their

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

By ANDREW URE, M. D., F. R. S., M. G. S., M. A. S., Lond., Mem. Acad. N. S. Philad., S. Ph. Soc. N. Germ. Hanov., Muln, &c. &c. &c.

Illustrated with 1241 Engravings

THIS is unquestionably the most popular work of the kind ever published, and a book most admirably adapted to the wants of all classes of the community. The following are the important objects which the learned author endeavors to accomplish:—

1st. To instruct the Manufacturer, Metallurgist, and Tradesman, in the principles of their respective processes, as to render them, in reality, the masters of their business; and, to emancipate them from a state of bondage to such as are too commonly governed by blind prejudice and a vicious routine.

2dly. To afford Merchants, Brokers, Drysalters, Druggists, and Officers of the Revenue, characteristic descriptions of the commodities which pass through their hands.

3dly. By exhibiting some of the finest developements of Chemistry and Physics, to lay open an excellent practical school to Students of these kindred sciences.

4thly. To teach Capitalists, who may be desirous of placing their funds in some productive branch of industry, to select, judiciously, among plausible claimants.

5thly. To enable gentlemen of the Law to become well acquainted with the nature of those patent schemes which are so apt to give rise to litigation.

6thly. To present to Legislators such a clear exposition of the staple manufactures as may dissuade them from enacting laws, which obstruct industry, or cherish one branch of it, to the injury of many others.

And, lastly, to give the general reader, intent, chiefly, on Intellectual Cultivation, views of many of the noblest achievements of Science, in effecting those grand transformations of matter to which Great Britain and the United States owe their paramount wealth, rank, and power, among the nations of the earth.

The latest Statistics of every important object of Manufacture are given from the best, and usually, from official authority, at the end of each article.

The work will be printed from the 2d London Edition, which sells for $12 a copy. It will be put on good paper, in new brevier type, and will make about 1400 8vo pages. It will be issued in twenty-one semi-monthly numbers, (in covers,) at 25 cents each, payable on delivery.

☞To any person, sending us five dollars, at one time, in advance, we will forward the numbers, by mail, post paid, as soon as they come from the press.

To suitable Agents, this affords a rare opportunity as we can put the work to them on terms extraordinarily favorable. In every manufacturing town, and every village, throughout the United States and Canada, subscribers may be obtained with the greatest facility. Address, post paid, La Roy Sunderland, 126 Fulton street, New-York.

⁂ To every editor who gives this advertisement entire 12 insertions, we will forward, to order, one copy of the whole work, provided the papers containing this notice be sent to the New-York Watchman, New-York. 51t12

The Harp of David.

Harp of David, sweetest lyre,
Ere by mortal fingers swept,
Thou didst first awake the fire
That within my bosom slept.
O, I never shall forget
When thy strains at first I heard;
Yes, the thought is with me yet
To all other thoughts preferred.

Harp of David, when I first
Entered on life's stormy sea,
Pride, ambition, and the thirst
Of worldly glory, captur'd me;
Darkness settled on my mind,
Doubt and terror dwelt within,
Nature smil'd, but I was blind,
Life was death, and thought was sin,

Harp of David, 'twas thy strain
Sweetly told me I was free,
Woke and bade me live again
A life of glorious liberty;
Breathe on me the life of love,
Joy and peace and light of will,
Oh! where'er on earth I rove,
May I hear thy music still.

THE DESERTED WIFE.

"It is midnight, deep midnight," murmured a lonely watcher by her sick infant's cradle, "and still he comes not.—Ah! surely he could not linger so if he knew your extremity, my darling."

With a noiseless step she approached the window, drew aside the curtain, and anxiously looked out and listend; but no footstep disturbed the silence, no form stole through the darkness; and with a fainting heart she resumed her place beside the suffering child. There she sat, pale and uncomplaining, till the last star faded away in its "azure depths," and the first the pure breath of morning fanned her cheek; there she sat, her eye of melting tenderness bent upon her boy, and her delicate fingers pressing the rapid pulse, till the sun rose high in the heavens; and still he was away—the husband and the father.

But that morning the village was busy with strange reports; and many exclamations of doubt and pity, sorrow and surprise, pass from the lips of its inhabitants.

"Gone! and with that abandoned woman! well, it don't seem possible," said one of Mrs. Spencer's neighbors to another, who had kindly come to tell her the news.

"Well, it don't; but there is no doubt of it; for he has been looked for high and low, and can't be found; and it is clear his wife knows nothing about him, for I just stepped into the kitchen to hint the suspicions that are going round, to Polly, and find out what she knew about it; and she said Mrs. Spencer was taking care of her child, and expecting her husband every minute."

"Wretched, misguided man!" said Mrs. Boyd, the more thoughtful and feeling of the two; "to leave his pretty, gentle, sweet-tempered wife for that cross ugly woman. Well, it is marvelous!"

"But then, it is just what she might have expected. Why she knew what he was when she married him."

"Yes, but then she hoped to reform him. A vain and foolish hope, to be sure; but he was rich and handsome, and so much in love, that he promised every thing; and she so young and inexperienced, that she believed all he promised."

"Well, I always thought, a professor as she was, you know, that some judgment would come upon her for marrying such a man."

"It was wrong, very wrong, no doubt," replied Mrs. Boyd; "but this is not the time to reproach her with it. Besides, my dear Miss Lacy, you know the proverb: "Let her that is without sin amongst us cast the first stone."

Miss Lacy colored slightly, and hastily tying her bonnet, departed to benefit the rest of her acquaintance with the same intelligence. Alas! gossip as she was, she was this once telling nothing but the truth; yet she, whom it most concerned, was the last to suspect it, the last to hear of it. Shut up in the room of her sick child, she saw no one but Polly, and Polly loved her mistress too well to give her pain; but she learned it, at last, too rudely. Bills, which she could not settle, came pouring in upon her during the morning. "What does it mean?" she asked herself, again and again, while she continued every minute to grow more and more anxious for her husband's presence. As she stood by an open window, exploring the street with aching eyes, a gentleman stepped up to the gate next of the next, which almost joined hers, and said to the proprietor, who was walking in his yard, "Well, it is ascertained beyond a doubt that Spencer has gone off."

"That does not surprise me," was the response; "I believe he has long been preparing for it."

The wretched wife did not scream or faint, but she sunk upon a chair, her frame stunned by the shock. Long she sat totally unconscious of every thing about her; her head thrown back against the wall, her face pale and cold, her eyes fixed on vacancy, and an occasional shivering, the only perceptible token of life. The faint wail of her child was the first sound which touched the electric chain; it roused her at once, and she tottered to his cradle; he opened his eyes; a soft faint smile played upon his lips, and he feebly attempted to stretch out his arms to her—the smile, the action, so touching to a mother's heart, unsealed the fountain of feeling, and tears poured like rain from her dry and burning eyes. She laid her head upon the pillow beside him, pressed her cheek to his, and sobbed, as infancy in its little troubles is wont to sob upon a mother's bosom, and gradually the weight that pressed upon her heart was lightened.

Then bitter thoughts of the past, the erring past, came thronging upon her brain. Months and years were lived over in a few short hours; and contrition, deep and sincere, flowed out in alternate musings and prayers like these: "Oh, my Father, thou dost not afflict willingly or grieve the children of men! Yes, I see it all now, —my own hands have wrought out this sorrow for me. I knew that religion was the only sure basis upon which to build domestic virtue and happiness; that where it is wanting, the golden lines of affection must soon grow weak and drop asunder—that it alone enables us to resist the cares and disappointments of life—to submit to each other's infirmities—to bear each other's burdens—and yet I knew that his heart was untouched by the sacred fire.—His vices were not concealed from me; but vain, presumptious, that I was, I believed, or rather tried to believe, that my influence and example would reclaim him. I forgot the command which says, 'give me thine heart,' and yielded it [illegible] a poor worm of the dust;—and now this 'god of my idolatry' is made the instrument of my punishment.

"Ah! how I sought by specious arguments, to quiet my accusing conscience.—My whole life, I said, shall be a transcript of the pure precepts of the gospel—the sole purpose of my being to win him to its obedience; not in humble faith, but in sinful reliance upon my own strength, did I say this; and now I am taught that my own strength is perfect weakness. Then I strove to persuade myself that my power of doing good would be greatly increased by marriage—for I had little of my own, and his wealth seemed almost boundless; but that wealth has melted away like an April snow or the morning dew, and I have learned that it is better to 'stay myself on the Lord, and keep his commandments,' than to 'trust in uncertain riches.'

"Oh, my Father! suffer me no more to wander from the straight and narrow way, or to pluck forbidden fruit; for though the broad path at first seemed strewed with flowers, thorns and briars soon sprang up around me, and the fruit turned to ashes in my hand. Ah! it is a bitter, but needful lesson thou art giving me,—that safety and happiness are found under the shadow of thy wing, only while we yield to thy guidance, and do thy will!

"Once I thought his affection could never fail me; that, come what would, there I should always find a refuge; but how soon did I mark the 'altered eye,' the unkind word, and the cold estrangement that wore my very heart away. And in this depth of sorrow, I forgot that I had one duty on earth beside, and gave up my whole life, every faculty of my soul, to win him back to me—and smiled, and put on a seeming cheerfulness, even while my being was withering away beneath the bitterness of disappointed affection. Ah! how I watched for one glance of tenderness, or one approving word, as if my hopes of Heaven depended upon it—and watched in vain. May I devote the remainder of my days to Him who never withholds his approbation from those who seek it sincerely; 'whose favor is life, and whose loving kindness is better than life.' Like a truant child have I wandered far away from thee, my Father, and sorely hast thou chastened me; now I would commit all my steps to thee, and follow where thou leadest, so shall my weary heart find rest."

Such were the reflections and prayers of the deserted wife, during this eventful day. She could think of the past only with deep feelings of self-reproach, and of the future, but with an earnest desire to be kept from such errors as had led to her present sorrow; of the pecuniary evils which threatened her she thought little.—"God will provide," she said to herslf, as she laid her head upon the pillow, to get a few hours rest, while Polly sat up with the child. "God will provide," she repeated over her solitary breakfast in the morning.

In a few days, little Henry, who had been trembling, as it were, between life and death, became convalescent; and in the meantime, it appeared that Spencer had disposed of every farthing's worth of available property, and left his wife and child pennyless.

"It is all well," she said, when the gentleman to whom the arrangement of her affairs had been entrusted, announced it to her.

He looked at her with surprise. "Have you then any resources of your own—any friends upon whom you can depend?"

"None!" she meekly answered; "but God will provide." Then she saw his look of doubt, and added, "I do not expect a miracle to be wrought for me. I do not look to be sustained with bread from heaven, or water from the rock, but for better things than these—for strength, and wisdom, and opportunity, to employ the faculties which He has given for my support."

"Burdened as you are with a child, and unused to exertion, that is not to be thought of."

"Not only thought of, but done, I trust," she answered. "You do not know of what a woman is capable—laboring for independence—a mother toiling for her child."

"Ah! you know nothing of the difficulties and discouragements through which you will be obliged to struggle; nothing of want, and its sickening pressure upon the heart; nothing of severe exertion; believe me your delicate frame would sink under the burden. It would be far better to apply to the rich relatives of your husband for assistance; it is true they live at a distance, but that is a slight objection; you have claims upon them undoubtedly, and I dare say they will be willing to acknowledge them."

"Whoever has youth, health and strength—those precious gifts of Heaven—and knowledge to turn them to account, has no claim upon charity; that is sacred to the sick, infirm, and ignorant. The world, perhaps, will call it pride, but I trust it is a better feeling which forbids my living a pensioner upon the bounty of others—a consciousness that I am bound to apply the talents God has given me to some useful purpose. I anticipated the result of this investigation from its commencement; and while watching by my child have had leisure to arrange my plans. I believe I am qualified to keep a school above the ordinary class of our common schools; such a one is wanted in the village, and I think my friends will be willing to place me in it."

"The school can be obtained for you, I have no doubt. But will your resolution sustain you through the difficulties you must encounter?"

"A consciousness that we are doing right, is a marvelous strengthener of the resolution, I find; it is when we are wrong that it is most apt to falter."

"But your child; what will you do with him?"

"Polly will continue with me; and I can confide him without fear to her judicious care. We shall hire a room, and take in sewing, or any kind of work which is offered to us; and if our health is continued, I hope we shall not want."

A few months after this, the same gentleman entered Mrs. Spencer's neat little room; she was engaged in sewing, but her eyes often wandered from her work to her darling boy, who was laughing, and shouting, and shaking his bright curls, in the height of infant glee, a smile was on the mother's lip; her sparkling eyes and cheeks just tinged with the faintest red, spoke of returning happiness and health.

"Ah!" he said "I find that I might have spared my forebodings of evil; your confidence of success has been realized."

"And more than realized," she answered. "I hoped only for a subsistence, but comforts, nay even luxuries, are mine; besides something accumulating against a time of need. Then exercise has brought back my appetite; occupation kept me from dwelling upon my sorrows; a consciousness that I am not living in vain, restored me to peace of mind. Ah! we are not so dependant upon external circumstances for happiness as we are apt to imagine. Wealth, fame, or power, cannot give it; but it is found in obeying God's will, and doing good to our fellow creatures."

MARRIED IN SPITE OF THEIR TEETH.—A Choice anecdote.—Old Governor Saltonstall, of Connecticut, who flourished some forty years since, was a man of some honor, as well as perseverance, in effecting the ends he desired. Among other anecdotes told of him by the New London people, the place where he resided, is the following.

Of the various sects which have flourished for their day, and then ceased to exist, was one known as the Rogersites, so called from their founder, a John, or a Tom, or some other Rogers, who settled not far from the goodly town aforesaid.

The distinguishing tenet of the sect was their denial of the propriety, and scripturality of form of marriage. "It is not good for man to be alone." This they believed and also that one should "cleave to her husband," but then this should be a matter of agreement merely, and the couple should come together and live as a man and wife, dispensing with all forms, of the marriage covenant. The old Governor used frequently to call upon Rogers, and talk the matter over with him, and endeavor to convince him of the impropriety of living with Sarah as he did. But neither John or Sarah would give up the argument.

It was a matter of coscience with them —they were very happy together as hey were—of what use then could a mere form be?—Suppose they would thereby escape scandal; were they not bound "to take up the cross," and live according to the rules they professed? The Governor's logic was powerless.

He was in the neighborhood of John one day, and meeting with him, accepted an invitation to dine with him. The conversation as usual turned upon the old subject.

"Now John," says the Governor, after a debate of the point, "why will you not marry Sarah? Have you not taken her to be your lawful wife?"

"Yes, certainly," replied John, "but my conscience will not permit me to mary her, in the forms of the world's people.'

"Very well. But you love her?"

"Yes."

"And respect her."

"Yes."

"And cherish her, as bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh?"

"Yes, certainly, I do."

"And you love him, and obey him, and respect him, and cherish him?"

"Certainly, I do."

"Then," cried the Governor, rising, "in the name of the laws of God, and the commonwealth of Connecticut, I pronounce you to be husband and wife?"

The ravings and rage of John and Sarah were of no avail—the knot was tied by the highest authority in the State.—Boston Mail.

FAITH OF THE INDIANS.—Catlin gives the following account of the belief of the Western tribes of Indians in a future state as described by an Indian chief:

'Our people all believe that the spirit lives in a future state—that it has a great istance to travel after death towards the west—that it has to cross a deep and rapid stream, which is hemmed in on both sides by high and rugged hills—over the stream, from hill to hill, there is a long slippery pine log, with the bark peeled off, over which the dead have to pass to the delightful hunting grounds. On the other side of the stream there are six persons of the good hunting grounds, with rocks in their hands, which they throw at all, when they are on the middle of the log. The good walk on safely to the hunting grounds, where there is one continual day—where the trees are are always green—where the sky has no clouds—where there are continually fine and cooling breezes—where there is one continual scene of feasting, dancing, and rejoicing—where there is no pain or trouble—and people never grow old, but forever live young and enjoy the youthful pleasures.

The wicked see the stones coming, and try to dodge, by which they fall from the log, and go down thousands of feet into the water, which is dashing over the rocks, and is stinking with dead fish and animals, where they are carried round and brought continually to the same place again in whirlpools—where the trees are all dead, and the waters are full of toads and lizards, and snakes—where the dead are always hungry and have nothing to eat—are always sick and never die—where the sun never shines, and where the wicked are continually climbing up by thousands on the sides of a high rock, from which they can overlook the beautiful country of the good hunting grounds, the place of the happy, but never can reach it.'

BEAUTIFUL SENTIMENT.—Sir, I would not exchange the physical sensations—the mere sense of animal being which belongs to a man who totally refrains from all that can intoxicate his brain or derange his nervous structure—the elasticity with which he bounds from his couch in the morning —the sweet repose it yields him at night —the feeling with which he drinks in, through his clear eyes, the beauty and the grandeur of surrounding nature. I say, sir, I would not exchange my conscious being, as a strictly temperate man—the sense of renovated youth—the glad play with which my pulses now beat healthful music; the bounding vivacity with which the life-blood courses its exulting way through every fibre of my frame—the communion high which my healthful ear and eye now hold with all the gorgeous universe of God—the splendors of the morning, the softness of the evening sky—the bloom, the beauty the verdure of the earth, the music of the air and the waters—with all the grand associations of external nature, re-opened to the fine avenues of sense;—no, sir, though poverty dogged me—though scorn pointed its slow finger at me as I passed—though want and destitution, and every element of earthly misery, save only crime, met my waking eyes from day to day;—not for the brightest and the noblest wreath that ever encircled a statesman's brow—not, if some angel commissioned by heaven, or some demon rather sent fresh from hell, to test the resisting strength of virtuous resolution, should tempt me back, with all the wealth, and all the honors which a world can bestow;—not for all that time or earth can give, would I cast from me this precious pledge of a liberated mind, this talisman against temptation, and plunge again into the dangers and the terrors which once beset my path:—so help me heaven, sir, as I would spurn beneath my very feet all the gifts the universe could offer and live and die as I am, poor but sober.—Marshall's Speech.

RELIGION AND LITERATURE.—"I fear much," said Luther, "that the Universities will be found great gates leading down to hell, unless they take diligent care to explain the holy scriptures, and to engrave them in the hearts of our youth. I would not advise any one to place his child where the Holy Scriptures are not regarded as the rule of life. Every Institution where God's word is not diligently studied, must become corrupt.

THE PICTURESQUE IN HOLLAND.—Holland can boast nothing sublime, but for picturesque foregrounds,—for close, compact, snug, home scenery, with every thing in harmony, and stamped with one strong peculiar character, Holland is a cabinet picture, in which nature and art join to produce one impression, one homogeneous effect.—The Dutch cottage, with its glistening brick walls, white painted wood work and rails, and its massive roof of thatch, with the stork clappering to her young on her old established nest on the top of the gable, is admirably in place and keeping, just where it is—at the turn of the canal, shut in by a screen of willow trees or tall reeds, from seeing, or being seen, beyond the sunny bright of the still calm water, in which its every tint and part is brightly repeated.

Then the peculiar character of every article of the household furniture, which the Dutch built house mother is scouring on the green before the door so industriously the Dutch character impressed on every thing Dutch, and intuitively recognized, like the Jewish or Gipsy countenance, wherever it is met with; the people, their dwellings, and all in or about them,—their very movements in accordance with this style of character, and all bearing its impress strongly—make this Holland, to my eye, no dull unimpressive land. There is soul in all you see; the strongly marked character about every thing Dutch pleases intellectually, as much as beauty of form itself. Where else is the charm so universally felt, requiring so little to be acquired, of the paintings of the Dutch school? The objects or scenes painted are neither graceful, nor beautiful, nor sublime; but they are Dutch. They have a strongly marked mind and character impressed on them, and every accompaniment in the picture has the same, and harmonious with all around it.

DRUGS & MEDICINES.

De Ruyter, June 15, 1842.

H. A. & F. C. DELLAY,

HAVE just received and opened 200 packages of DRUGS & MEDICINES, which they will sell to Physicians lower than they can buy them in Utica, Syracuse, Hamilton or Norwich, and warrant all articles of their sale.

TO FAMILIES, who buy Medicine for their own immediate use, they take pleasure in saying, that they have a full supply of all of the popular Medicines of the day, and will at any time be glad to wait upon them, either by day or night.

Among their extensive stock of Medicines, may be found the following:

Egyptian Balm.

This is to certify that I have used the Egyptian Balm in my family for a number of years, and I do cheerfully recommend it to any one afflicted with Indigestion or Pain in the Stomach, Bowels, Back or Side, Headache, &c. For Bruises or recent Burns, it is far the best remedy I ever used or knew of. It is worth more for Burns than it costs, if it was good for nothing else. I would not be deprived of it in my family on any account; and I have been acquainted with various families that have used it for many years, and I have never known a single instance of its disapproval. It is a sure preventive of taking cold when exposed, by taking two teaspoonfuls in a little water; also use in the same way for a violent Cold, or Quinsy, bathing the throat at the same time with the same.

Yours, truly, A. C. BABCOCK.

Buffalo, July 19, 1841.

Mr. J. M. Clark, Sir—I have been using your Egyptian Balm in some cases of Nervous Headache of long standing, and find it an invaluable and Sovereign Remedy for the same. Rochester, Feb. 2, 1842. GEO. KEENY, Botanic Physician

Mr. J. M. Clark—Having used your Egyptian Balm in my family and work-shop, amongst my hands, for a few years past, I take much pleasure in recommending it to others, as I believe it an invaluable Medicine for Coughs and Colds, and as an external application in cases of Sprains, Burns, Bruises, Cuts, &c. I consider it a Medicine which every family should always keep on hand for an immediate application and use. I think there is nothing better. Yours, MARTIN BRIGGS.

I certify that since my son was so much relieved by the use of your Balm, I have used it in my family with much success, for the Toothache, Pain in the Breast, &c. My daughter being much afflicted with Pain and Swelled Limbs, found permanent relief by using your Balm. My confidence is greatly increased respecting its medical properties, and I believe it to be no humbug. ASAHEL WOOD.

Resurrection or Persian Pills.

Allow me, through the medium of your paper, to express my opinion of the very highly esteemed Persian Pills—that is, highly esteemed where known; for it is an indubitable fact that all who become acquainted with them dismiss every other popular remedy from their families, and rely solely upon them. But it is a fact, not so generally known as it should be, that such persons invariably escape all the prevalent diseases of the season, and that not one has been known to be taken down with any kind of sickness, who has kept and taken these Pills on the first symptoms of disease.

JEW DAVID'S Or Hebrew Plaster.

Messrs. Comstock & Co.—Gent.—Having sold the Jew David's or Hebrew Plaster, prepared by you, for the last two years, I take great pleasure in saying, that so far as I have had an opportunity to know, it has given the most decided satisfaction.—A rather singular case came under my observation a short time since, in which the virtues of this Plaster were plainly manifested. It was, I should think, in the first place, simply a Sprain in the Wrist, but by being neglected, had become very much swollen and inflamed, and which seemed to threaten the entire loss of the hand; as the person then had but a partial use of his fingers, he used two bottles of Opodeldoc, and subsequently one bottle of [illegible] Arabian Balsam, but obtained no sensible relief; having in the first place recommended a box of this Plaster, the person now concluded to try it; and to my own surprise and his too, in less than two weeks he was entirely cured. I might mention many more cures of a different character, but will only add, that its absence from our shops would be a great misfortune to those afflicted with the diseases it professes, and in my estimation is admirably adapted to cure; and hope, at least, that you will keep me constantly supplied.

A careful perusal of the following, may be a benefit to the reader. If you are troubled with pain in the Side, or Liver Affection, Pain between the Shoulders or in the small of the Back, here is your remedy. If you are troubled with hard Swellings about the Neck or any other part of the body, King's Evil, Hard Tumors, Scrofulous Swellings or Ague Cakes, a remedy is within your reach which never fails. Rheumatism never has existed, nor can exist, where this remedy has been applied.—Hundreds who have used crutches have been restored to the use of their limbs.

The Farmer's and Horseman's True Guide,

Pointing out the perfections and imperfections of the HORSE, with cures for his diseases, and for NEAT CATTLE.

This small volume has been mostly selected from the most approved Farrier Books now in use. The most experienced farmers have examined the work, and pronounced it a useful book. It gives a general description of nearly all the diseases horses and cattle are subject to, and explains simply how the animals are to be doctored, and with what medicine. The book costs fifty cents, and is worth five dollars to any one who is not an experienced Farrier.

The Quaker and Indian Plaster.

This is beyond all question one of the most valuable preparations ever discovered. For many very distressing and often fatal complaints, it has long been regarded as a sovereign and unfailing remedy. Among these are—

1st. Affections of the Chest, Weakness of the Lungs and predisposition to Consumption. Where there is the least indication of this fatal disease, either hereditary or accidental, the chest should at once be covered with this potent remedy, and it should be worn till all unpleasant symptoms disappear. There is a vast difference between external and internal remedies, in Diseases of the Lungs, which is not generally understood. Almost all the balsams, cough drops and the numerous preparations for affections of the lungs, tend, it is true, to allay the cough by their relaxing effect, but this same relaxation tends greatly to predispose the invalid to take an additional cold—so that there is a constant succession of colds and cough, till the sufferer is beyond hope or help. The effect of this Plaster is very different—it cures by invigorating and strengthening, not by relaxation—it tends directly to prevent a cold. These are facts of vast importance, and should be made known to every individual.

2d. For Rheumatic Affections—no matter of how long standing, or of how obstinate and painful a character, if it is applied to the affected part and persevered in, it will produce almost unfailing relief.

This Plaster may also be applied with great success in Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, and Pain in the Stomach, Nervous Toothache, Headache, White Swellings, Scrofulous Swellings and Ulcers, Old Sores, Weakness and Numbness in the Limbs, Stiff Joints, Corns, Wounds, Burns, Bruises, etc.

Consumption

DR. TAYLOR'S Balsam of Liverwort, for diseases of the lungs, pains in the side, palpitation of the heart, soreness of the chest, hectic fever and all affections of the chest, liver, &c. &c.

Liverwort, even in the common way of preparation, is universally known as the best article for diseases of the Lungs ever discovered; it is obvious that a highly concentrated preparation, securing the whole virtue of this inestimable herb, must be invaluable. Moreover, this medicine contains the medical properties of the Bugleweed, Lungwort, Fever Root and many other roots and herbs. It is also warranted not to contain any mercury, mineral, or mineral preparation, and $1.000 reward will be given any person who will prove this medicine to contain any minerals of any kind. Such has been the success of this Balsam, that it is warranted incapable of producing, in any instance, injurious effects.

To persons of disordered nervous system, or those who are unable to rest well at night, this medicine is most emphatically recommended.

Certificates without number are in the hands of the subscribers, and persons in this vicinity have used it with the most signal success, as they stand ready to testify.

Sabbath Tracts--Our Obligation.

It is now several months since the Circular of the General Agent of the Tract Society, was presented to our brethren. In that paper the Agent gave a statement of the past history, and present condition of the Society, which would seem sufficient to satisfy every candid mind, and to remove the objections which some had felt to the Society's course. At the same time, he presented a plan for future operations, and called for contributions to assist him in carrying it out. To this plan, with the considerations which seem to demand its adoption and execution, the attention of those interested in the general subject of Sabbath Tracts is asked.

The leading feature of the plan, and one which ought to commend it to our favor, is that it proposes the publication and circulation of tracts bearing directly and exclusively upon the subject of the Sabbath. We, as practical believers in the binding authority of the fourth command, stand before the world in a position somewhat peculiar. Most of the doctrines which distinguish the mass of Christians, we adopt and practice. At the same time, we can not but feel, that the great body of those who profess attachment to the cause of Christ have gone away from the Bible rule in regard to the Sabbath.—As those who know the truth on this subject, and who are understood to be its representatives, the especial work which we have to do is connected with the exhibition of that truth. Heretofore our attention has been divided, and by attempting to do what others were ready and obliged to do, we have failed to give that prominence to the views which distinguish us that their importance demands. Now, a different plan is proposed, and the Society, through its agent, calls upon us to afford the means of making others acquainted with our views, and of bringing them to feel and acknowledge their justice.—In order to do this, he has solicited articles on different branches of the Sabbath question, from those who are qualified to throw light on the subject, and has now nearly ready for publication a series of Tracts which cover the ground peculiar to us. He asks that those for whom he labors would contribute liberally for the immediate publication and extensive circulation of these. Does not the plan commend itself to the approval of all? Will any hesitate to come forward to the work?

A great many considerations showing our obligations to carry out this plan, might be urged. Among these, none can fail to feel the necessity of some such exposition of our views. It can not and ought not to be disguised, that though our churches now embrace some thousands of members, and most christians have the means of knowing that there exists a body of those who believe the seventh day of the week to be the Christian Sabbath, yet there are very few who understand the reaasons of our belief and practice. In many minds the impression is, that while we are believers in Christ, we yet have not fully escaped from the bonds of Judaism. And although from time to time, in our intercourse with them, and while explaining our views and giving the reason of our hope, it is seen that the Bible gives us its support, yet this does not become a settled conviction—it soon wears away, and the old feeling returns upon those who had been in part enlightened. Something is needed to give permanency to the impressions which our presence & words had made. In no way can this necessity be better supplied, than by means of such tracts as furnish a condensed and conclusive exhibition of the truth, enforced by such appeals as Christian minds must feel.

Another consideration which ought not to be overlooked, is that at the present time there is great encouragement to put forth these views. Let it not be supposed by this that there ever are or can be times when it is unwise or useless to urge home the truth upon men's hearts. To adopt such a belief would be in a high degree unscriptural and atheistic. God has now as he has always had, a hand in this world, and will not permit the feeblest effort, put forth in his fear and for the advancement of his truth, to fall powerless. Every such effort shall in the end be seen and felt to have contributed to promote the great end for which the child of God is placed in the world—to exert an enlightening and saving influence upon others. But while this is true, it can not be doubted there are times when especial encouragement to labor is afforded—when men's minds are open to influences. It is not a new thought, the present is one of those seasons.—There are many things which now contribute to throw men upon their own responsibility, and to produce within them a feeling of freedom and obligation to examine for themselves the foundation of their belief and practice. It can not be doubted the strong arm of tradition has become to some extent paralized; and while this has opened the way for many and hurtful heresies, it has at the same time prepared the way for truth to find admittance, and produced a deep conviction in many minds of the necessity of coming back to the old standards, and holding fast to the charter of their hopes. Now, then, is the time to work, while no obstacle shuts the ears or hardens the hearts of men to the truth.—And now is the time when the Providence of God, by bringing about this state of things, requires and encourages those who know the truth and have felt its power, to enforce it upon the naked hearts and consciences of their fellow men.

One more consideration, and one which embraces all the others, we ought to think upon and feel—it is our responsibility. The Bible has long since decided, that in the question "am I my brothers keepers," there is no apology for neglecting to use our exertions to bring those who are in error to obey the truth. It is not enough, that we love the right way and walk in it. That which is the right way for us is the right way for others. And if we are under obligations to obey the law of God, there does the same obligation rest upon them. Will God hold us guiltless, if, knowing this, we neglect to use every means in our power to bring them to the knowledge of it?—We have too long stood on the defensive, and been content to let those around us do as they would, on condition of being ourselves left at liberty to follow the dictates of our own consciences. This position is for many reasons a dangerous one. It is dangerous, because it exposes us to place a light estimation upon truths which we ought to hold sacred, and ought to be ready perseveringly to practice and boldly to defend. By all the regard, therefore, which we have for this general principle of the Bible, that for him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin—as well as by the regard we have for our own safety and consistency, we are called upon to take a different stand, and to contend more earnestly for the faith with which we are identified.—Shall we prove recreant to these obligations?

An opportunity practically to answer this question is afforded by the appeal of the Society's agent for assistance to publish and circulate tracts on this subject—Brethren, think candidly upon the necessities of this, with other benevolent objects—be honest with yourselves in deciding of your ability—bring forward your offerings cheerfully, according as the Lord hath prospered you—and remember that there is a giving which impoverisheth not, and a withholding which doeth not enrich. For the New York Evangelist.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

The morning was one of uncommon beauty, the green ornaments of June, its blossoms and flowers covered the land. I was walking in the garden, listening to the music of the birds, and attempting to unite in their hymn of praise. The wild breathings of Nature went up in a cloud of grateful incense to its Creator and Lord; but my mind was not in sympathy with the lovely scenes around me—my sluggish thoughts refused to ascend to God. Clouds of unbelief and sin had interrupted the light of his countenance, and banished from my mind the hopes and consolations of his word. As I contemplated the hidden mysteries of iniquity in the heart, the picture became darker on my eye, and filled me with confusion and distress. I heard the thunders of the divine law: before me were its blackness and darkness and tempest. I listened to its sound of trumpet, and its voice of words. I saw not the bleeding sacrifice, I heard not the accents of inviting mercy—the language of prayer died on my lips, for there was no mediator between God and my soul.

I was roused from this gloomy reverie, by a messenger who requested my immediate attendance at the bed-side of a dying friend. It is probably, said the man, this is the last opportunity you will have to witness her triumph over death and the grave—she seems to be in the presence of her Redeemer, and among the spirits of the just made perfect.

I obeyed the summons, and in half an hour reached the spot, where the scene of the heavenly world were mysteriously blended with those of earth. Her countenance was already changed. The image of death was there—so also were the brightness and beauty of heaven—

"Eternity and Time
Met for a moment here—
From earth to heaven, a scale sublime
Rested on either sphere."

"You have come," said she, "to see me die—to stand with me on the utmost boundaries of earth, and rejoice with me in my victory over sin and death."

"I do rejoice," said I, "that you have the presence of your Redeemer, and the light of his countenance."

"I have long been subject to bondage through fear of death, but now, every step I take in the dark valley, opens some new prospect of the heavenly rest. The clouds that covered the mercy-seat have fled away, and the bright shining of the Son of Righteousness fills my soul with joy and peace in believing. Oh, it is a privilege to die."

"What now are your views of the law of God?"

"That law is inexpressibly glorious. It shines with a majesty and purity which would dazzle and confound me, did I not see it through the medium of the cross. Oh blessed cross! by which the overpowering splendor is sweetly attempered to my eye."

"Have you no conflict with sin?—no doubts of your acceptance?—no fears that you were self-deceived?"
